

PILGRIM JOE.

Adventures Await Him Every Day in the Week.

I was welcomed with enthusiasm at the town of Root Hog, and during the day I took 70 tinnyets at ten cents a take. When nightfall came, I sought the people of the merits of my Pilgrim Pain Alleviator from a box on the public square, and 24 bottles were sold at the usual price of 25 cents a bottle. My beautiful, my beautiful, my beautiful whiskers had made me friends and had given the populace confidence in my word, and if I had had four dozen more I could have sold them out to the last one at 24 apiece. It is a lovely thing to have your fellow man believe in you, and you should never take advantage of the same to his undoing.

When I retired to my room in the tavern that night I had a balmy feeling of the heart I had in the possession of during the day and not broken any of the commendments and I found myself remarking to myself: "A coral baron may take one of ten thousands, and a Chicago packer may own a yacht and an automobile at the same time, but the man who has the love of his fellow man has something better than gold."

I had just fallen asleep to dream of flying about on golden wings when my door was suddenly burst open and six stalwart patriots seized and dragged me out of bed and down stairs. When I asked for explanations I was informed that my Alleviator had caused the death of an eminent citizen, and that I was to swing for it. They weren't going to give me no show at all, and I was to be hanged in the place of execution when the keeper of the tavern interfered. It wasn't that he loved me, but that he wanted me to pay my bill before I swung. His interference gave me a chance to get my breath, however, and in the course of half an hour the following facts were brought to light:

That the late deceased citizen was a sufferer from heart disease. That the doctors had warned him against violent excitement. That instead of buying a bottle of my Alleviator on the public square that evening he had bought a bottle of corn juice in a drug store. That on going home he and his wife had got into an argument, followed by a tussle, and that he had run outdoors and dropped dead.

Some of the members of the more enthusiastic of the population wanted to hang me for my whiskers, but the more conservative stepped in and I was allowed to live and liberty. Apologies was even extended along with a glass of ginger-ale, but instead of returning to my couch I silently and without any bid before I swung. His interference gave me a chance to get my breath, however, and in the course of half an hour the following facts were brought to light:

GIRL TO STUMP FOR PARKER.

MARGARET INGELS.

Miss Margaret Ingels, a pretty and talented girl of Paris, Ky., has tendered her services to the National Democratic committee and her services have been accepted. She has been notified that she will be assigned to speak in the west. In the last campaign Miss Ingels made many speeches for Bryan and she was popular.

charges with being her runaway husband. "If a pilgrim can't travel over Oklahoma selling Pain Alleviator and founding orphan asylums without being jumped on by women signa to live in extravagance then how can we hope to build up industries and make ourselves a great people?"

"It's the opinion of this population, as expressed through me, that Hanner made a mistake in being sorry for it, but that Pilgrim Joe is also sorry for her. He's so sorry that he didn't take out the man wanted that he will present her with a $10 bill and his best wishes for her welfare."

"I was quick to hand out the money, but Hanner wasn't quick to accept it. As a matter of fact she broke away from them who was holding her and made another rush at me and she was not recaptured until she had chased me around the tent six or seven times and fallen on her nose. When she realized that optical delusions had been put upon her, she looked the money and engaged a team to carry her to another town. When she had departed the mayor came to me and asked for the loan of $15 for a few days. He was speculating in jack rabbits and wanted the money to cover his margin."

"Not at all," says he. "That claim was made by Hanner, but the claim was forwarded by Hanner. I had no part in it. Not at all," says he. "That claim was made by Hanner, but the claim was forwarded by Hanner. I had no part in it. Not at all," says he. "That claim was made by Hanner, but the claim was forwarded by Hanner. I had no part in it."

"The race is not allus to the swift. There's many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip. It isn't right for a husband to run away from his wife in Indiana, but if he does run, it's her duty to replace him and go on being happy again."

"The husband who'll go back on his wife after being everlastingly replaced serves the cause of the world, but he can't be too careful in identifying her. Don't let any optical delusions get into you, and if the mayor asks for any more loans put him off till you can get out of town."

"The little station at Clatworth had wakened from its usual noontide slumbers for the advent of the important trains of the day—one from Anderson Junction, bringing passengers from the London express; the other from remote country towns, conveying those who desired to catch the up train at the Junction for Waterloo."

"As he seemed to know the station and necessitated a fortnight's sojourn at this dead-alive village, he had been of little account either in his own or in other world."

"Then his chance had come and he had taken it. Five years of rough-and-tumble life in every quarter of the globe with a squalid and undistinguished life in the sunburnt features, the dark, menacing eyes, the strong, brown hair that seemed to switch toward him, he remembered everything."

"There had been a quarrel between the man and himself over a girl—Epplie, the village belle. The young commercial had interfered with their courting, had captured Epplie's truant fancy with his affection of superiority and town ways, and after persuading her to throw the other over his head, had played fast and loose with her himself."

"It had been a fortnight's interlude of mock sentiment and passion to him, a lifetime of love and desperate grief to her. When he said good-bye to her in the mill lane, and she realized that he had fallen for her, she gave one bitter cry, and, having no other resource, she had run across the adjoining field, had leaped the intervening hedge, and had struck him down with one swift, savage blow."

"He had picked himself up and gone away with a curse in his heart, not daring to risk a fight, for the discarded lover's mad with jealousy. And now, for the first time they were face to face again."

"For an instant both were silent; then the engine driver said, honestly, 'What are you doing here?' And the other, with a contemptuous smile, said: 'How's Epplie?'"

"The driver's furious gaze flickered, and the traveler intuitively looked past the engine, across the station yard to a patch of green, where, at a cottage door, a woman, young and comely, stood with a child in her arms."

"The blazing sunlight shone full on their faces, glinting in the gold of their hair, enhancing the clear white and rosy light of their cheeks; they looked an embodiment of spring and summer, of childhood's and womanhood's health, mental and physical, in its perfection."

"And, looking back into the driver's eyes, the traveler read the intolerable suspicion and jealous fear that flashed into them, and understood what had happened in those five years. His own anger of revenge had come; he had neither waited for it nor counted on it to the full."

"I was coming along to the Junction," he said, "but I'll wait for the next train. Then I can have a talk with Epplie about old times. And he deliberately turned his gaze toward the cottage door on the green."

"The driver's hand fell like a sledge hammer on the brake, and he seemed as if he would leap from the engine; but the guard had given the signal of departure, and the train glided slowly out of Clatworth, while the words 'Curse you!' smote the air like the lash of a red-hot whip."

"The station master at the Junction to the stoker of the Clatworth, and he seemed to have gone queer—says he must get home for a bit, and he'll be back to take the afternoon train. If he has to run the whole way, it's 'T' with a significant pause."

"It's to do with his wife," said the stoker, slowly. He said it as if he were speaking of a great sorrow by her and he thinks there's trouble up there. But he'll keep his word sure enough and be back in time for her."

Meanwhile the driver had made his way to the 'goods' just starting for Clatworth. It seemed an eternity to him until his cottage came in sight, and he stumbled out of the van like a man who has had too much strong drink; but the porter laid a detaining hand on him and pointed toward the waiting room, round the door of which a group of people clustered, peering and whispering."

"What's up?" said the driver, huskily. "You remember that commercial chap was barging round here five years since or thereabouts? He came back to take the afternoon train, but he's not here. So he went across to the parcels office and put his bag in, and stopped there along of me. It might have been a couple of minutes or more. I never thought to warn him or to brought you back. She'll be main glad to see you before your time."
