

JOHN PLITCHER, a young man, who had been in the city some time, had just returned from a visit to his father's house, and was sitting in the office of the editor of the 'Interior Journal', waiting for a chance to see the editor. He had been told by a friend that the editor was a very nice man, and that he would be glad to see him.

The editor, who had just finished his breakfast, looked up at the young man as he entered the office. He had a friendly and pleasant expression on his face, and he welcomed the visitor in a cordial manner. The young man, who was named John Plitcher, introduced himself and told the editor that he had just returned from a visit to his father's house.
