I accordingly fixed, naturally, on the rural districts, where the contrast between the general aspect of nature and my condition would be less striking.

"I went to a small town in New Hampshire and hung out my 'shingle' in a little saw-mill kind of a village, where the people were mostly lumber men, with a sprinkling of French-Canadians. There I thought I might pick up enough preliminary practice to cut my professional teeth.

"But even with the advantages of this rustic, green background, there was still a vernal contrast not in my favor. I could see that even the lum bermen's wives made fun among themselves of the young doctor and his new trunk, but the old people of the place, particularly the old ladies, seem to nterested them, but as for paying me, plunge at me.
