FRIDAY December 16 1898.

OUR trouble with Spain now seems to be nearing an end. The treaty between the United States and Spain was signed at Paris Saturday night. The fact was officially announced to the President by Mr. Day, who also cabled a full statement of the contents of the eight principal articles of the treaty. These articles relate to the relinquishment of sovereignty over Cuba, the cession of Guam, Porto Rico and the Philippines, with detailed stipulations as to the evacuation of the Philippines, and the release of Filipino and Cuban prisoners held by Spain in exchange for Spaniards held by Aguinaldo. So far, so good. But we very much fear that Uncle Sam's troubles are now beginning. The government of the "job lot" he now has on hand will be the knottiest problem the old fellow has ever had to deal with. If the whole mess could be sold, at a fair profit, Uncle Sam could then resume business at the same old stand, have a lot of worry off his hands and a nice "wad" in his pocket beside.

A CORRESPONDENT of the New York Herald and Courier-Journal, who has made a careful tour of the islands, is forced to the conclusion that it is impossible to recognize a native republic in the Philippines. The rebels are of the lowest type and are opposed to any government. The better classes are disgusted and want the insurgents driven from the towns, where they live by pillage. They believe that American rule can be gradually but firmly introduced, and that an army of 25,000 men, with modern artillery, could force the disbanding of the rebel army.

A CITY judge at Hopkinsville has posted "inebriate lists" in all saloons in that city, and the name of every fellow who has been fined more than once for drunkenness, appears thereon. The judge has certainly never wrestled with king alcohol, or he would know that whenever a fellow wants a drink and has the price, the fluid will be forthcoming despite all the work done to prevent it. He's on a cold to it with his list. There is only one way in this world to stop a man from drinking, and that is, convince him of the error of his way give Keely a shot at him and then keep him at work.

The people of Louisville have given a rousing and appropriate welcome to the Legion this week. This action shows the appreciation the people have for their soldier boys. This is all well, and we sincerely hope the Louisville daily papers will now find time to publish something beside the movements and matters of these troops. For the last two weeks they have printed scarcely anything else, and the rural readers have had a bountiful sufficiency, thank you.

THE $20 steer case of Noland vs. Noland, in Madison, was decided Wednesday, in favor of the plaintiff. The costs together with lawyer's fees aggregated over $800. It was the fourth trial of the case. This is a fair sample of the way some people hold on when they get to "sawing." As long as they stand off the la'yers and clerk for fees, the case generally stays in court.

It looks very much like the Jim Crow car has come to stay. The Appellate Court has overruled a petition for rehearing in the case of the Ohio Valley railroad vs. Lander. This is the case in which a decision was handed down some weeks ago, upholding the separate coach law. If the "colored niggers" are given the same accommodations as white folks, we fall to see why they should kick. They ought to be glad to be separated from some classes of white trash.
