ROMANCE OF MARY HARRIS.

How Judge Bradley Defended and Married the Emotional Murderess.

The recent death of the venerable Judge Joseph H. Bradley of this city, recalls the celebrated case which was the central fact of his career and which obtained a national renown. Judge Bradley was well stricken in years, says a Washington writer. He was the oldest member of the bar in the district of Columbia and a gentleman of excellent repute and high standing in the community. His ability as an advocate, which always ranked well, was put to a hard test and did not prove lacking, in the case to which allusion has been made and with the details of which the country was ringing twenty-three years ago. Along during the war there was a young unmarried man named Borroughs in the employ of the Government here. He was a clerk in the Treasury Department, and was engaged to be married to a Kentucky girl named Mary Harris. Burroughs himself was a Kentuckian also, I believe, but I am not sure as to this point. They had been engaged for a long time, and it had been understood between them that as soon as possible after he had gained his expected citizenship at Washington, and had got settled and a little "ahead" financially, he would marry her, and the marriage would then take place. Burrows got his position, and kept it a long while, but for diplomatic notification was not to the country. Months elapsed, perhaps years, but he seemed not to be able to get "settled" enough to marry—at any rate the Kentucky girl heard no news of her destined lover, although they corresponded constantly, as betrothed lovers, and his letters as well as hers, were all that a lover could wish them to be.

But, though Burrows apparently had so much trouble in getting things ready for his marriage with Mary Harris, he had found it easier to manage in the case of another fair damsel whom he had met in this city, and in the light of whose smiles he had allowed the vision of his fateful Kentucky girl to fade and vanish away. In other words, he changed his mind and proved fickle to Mary, and that, too, without informing her of the fact, either directly or indirectly; and his marriage to the other lady was at last appointed for a certain day in 1861.

But in an evil hour for him Mary Harris in some way received information of the perfidy of Burrows and of the date of his proposed nuptials—one time then being near at hand. She did not collapse or spend any time in lamentation or conferences with her kindred and friends. As soon as she heard the news she started directly for Washington, just as she was. She did not change her dress, nor did she stop to "pack up." Without any baggage or change of apparel she went at once from her home to the railway station, only stopping on the road to buy a pistol, and took the first train eastward. Upon her arrival in this city she went to no hotel or restaurant, but, without any dallying and at the same time without any perceptible excitement in her manner, proceeded straight to the Treasury building, walked into one of the entrances, found her way to the right corridor, sent word into Burrows' room that some one wished to see him outside the door, and when he responded in person, after exchanging a few sentences with him and learning from him that the news was true, she quietly drew her pistol and shot him dead, almost on the very eve of his wedding day.

She then turned on her heel and walked off in a business-like way, but made no effort to escape and was of course soon arrested. The tragedy and the unusual circumstances attending it made a profound impression on the public far and near. The trial was highly sensational and attracted spectators from all parts of the country. Mary Harris' counsel was Judge Bradly, and although the evidence was strongly against her and the sentiment of the public, which might have been on her side if she had not been so cool about it all, was also rather against her, he brought her through triumphantly on the theory that, though perfectly sane before and after the occurrence, she was at that time suffering from a temporary attack of "emotional insanity." This was the first instance of precisely this line of defense and the phrase became a by-word everywhere. Notwithstanding the popular incredulity as to the existance of such a thing as momentary "emotional insanity," and notwithstanding the apparent weakness as a plea, it was successful in this case and was subsequently applied with frequency and success in similar cases, the case of Laura D. Fair, who killed ex-Senator Crittenden in California, being perhaps the most conspicuous one.

But Mary Harris did not get off scot free immediately. She was adjudged innocent of murder, but still insane, and accordingly she was sentenced to confinement in St. Elizabeth's Asylum in this city. The scene at her acquittal was a most extraordinary one. There was a great hubbub, in the midst of which Judge Bradley kissed his fair client and exclaimed that she was a noble woman, and that if there were more like her there would be fewer scamps in the world—which proposition would seem to be undeniably true.

Miss Harris was subjected to nominal confinement in the asylum for many years, although in reality she was under no constraint. She could come and go when she liked, and if she had chosen to she could have escaped at any time. In fact, she often passed whole months away from the asylum, at the Virginia Springs or other Summer resorts. Almost everybody felt sure that she was not in the least insane.

The sequel may not be known to many, but it is one of the most striking parts of the story. After some years Judge Bradley got Mary Harris legally discharged from the asylum as restored to sanity and then he married her. And to-day the heroine of the tragedy of 1861 is bending tearfully over the death-bed of the faithful man who saved her life then and has been devoted to it ever since.

A Pair of Queer Artists.

Thirty years ago Edward Critland, a young artist of Cincinnati, exhibited a painting of considerable merit at the Mechanics' institute there. Some one ruined the painting by thrusing a cane through the canvas, and the artist grieved so over the loss that his mind became unsettled and he disappeared. He fell in with another artist, a young Scotchman, named George Bryce, who was also of unbalanced mind and imagined that he was not his reputed father's son. These two congenial spirits became very close friends. They went back to Cincinnati, where their parents lived, and rented a little back room, and have lived there ever since, unknown to any of their friends. They sold but an occasional painting to supply their wants, and now their walls are covered with really fine paintings, inferior work being destroyed to make room for better. Their friends have only recently discovered them, but the artists refuse to have anything to do with them, or to sell pictures of others to ruin

The trial of Edward Palmer for murder has been adjourned until April 17, at which time the court will hold a special term for that purpose. A special jury of 100 will be ordered by the court, from which to draw an impartial jury. The people are continually obtaining additional proof to convict Palmer of a most atrocious crime.
