The Indispensable Mule. The mule is a distinct separate species of quadruped. No process of development produced this useful worker. He is a hybrid—a cross between a jack and a mare of the horse tribe. So far nature is courteous and gives us the mule, but beyond that she will not go. No horse or mare mule can multiply its kind, so they must have been created for some purpose. The mule is distinctively a farmer's beast of labor. They cannot be had in sufficient numbers to do the work of the United States.

The honest toll he gives made possible the cultivation of lands, mining and thousands of other purposes and among these are many uses the mule is put to that no other animal could be used. In mining and army uses the mule is put to that which no other beast could begin to do.

The mule knows more in five minutes than a horse could learn in five weeks.

Like a horse, the mule must be kept in place. If the mule gets to be boss it is all up with the driver; but you do not have to abuse him to be boss. Mules instinctively avoid all holes and dangerous places. A team of runaway mules generally run more for the sport than from fright and they generally always stop before any danger is done. Some people think just because he is a mule he can be beaten and ill treated in every way and it makes no difference.

A mule will respond to good treatment just the same as a horse, and the most of them like to be petted. Half of the perversity of temper for which he is notorious comes from poor handling when breaking in, or afterwards; for once antagonized, a mule is remarkably set in her ways. The marked variations in their characters is as wide as those among men.

CONFEDERATE VETERANS General Moise of St. Louis, Elected Major General For Ensuing Year.

LIBERTY, Mo., Oct. 15.—At the final business session of the United Confederate Veterans' reunion, which has been in session here two days, General A. Melroe, and G. P. Gross of Kansas City was chosen as brigadier general of the Western Division.

At the session Wednesday several resolutions recommended by the Resolution Committee were passed.

The reunion went on record by resolution as favoring Denver, Colo., as the place of meeting for the national convention to be held in 1915.

Another resolution was passed favoring the adoption of the Gettysburg Peace Memorial association. The report of the Confederate Home at Higginsville, presented by J. W. Halliburton, showed that the home is in the best of condition.

The place of meeting for next year will be decided by the three generals commanding. It is a custom, shall be at the home of the major general, and in that case the reunion will be held next year in St. Louis. MISS LONG HURT BY HORSE Expects to Compete in All but Tandem Class Here, However.

KANSAS CITY, Mo., Oct. 21.—Miss Lula Long, horse-show exhibitor, suffered two broken bones in her left hand today while trying out a new jumping horse.

The injury will prevent Miss Long from riding any of her horses, either at the Kansas City horse show, or at the coming shows in St. Louis and New York.

She expects, however, to be able to drive in all except the tandem class.

That fight against shingles is becoming serious. Father may have to find something new to use on John.
