FARM NOTES.

IN THE GARDEN AND ORCHARD.

Unleached ashes possess fertilizing qualities far beyond the estimated value of potash therein, as lime and phosphoric acid are also constituents. Leached ashes may also be used with advantage on soils deficient in lime or potash.

Run the roller over fields that have had the wheat thrown up by frost. As soon as the wheat begins to grow give the field a harrowing with a smoothing harrow, which will be found an advantage in giving the crop a good start.

Currants can be easily grown, and the bushes last many years with care. The only difficulty is the currant worm, which can be subdued with application of hellebore. Currants are always salable, and should be more extensively grown.

Foil odors in milk contracted from the foul air of stables, from unsuitable food or from filth introduced into the milk in the process of milking or otherwise, cannot be entirely removed by aeration. In these cases prevention is the best cure.

Cocoons of the codling moth may be found under the rough bark of the trunk and larger limbs of the apple tree, if birds have not already taken them. However, enough may be left under boards and other shelter to stock the next season's crop.

Sandy soil is not as fertile as a loam or clay soil, but the labor required on a sandy soil is much less. The proper time for spreading manure on light soils is early in the spring, but on heavy soils such work may be done in the fall or during the winter.

Plant everything in the garden in long, straight rows so as to lessen the cultivation.

With trees set out in the fall, it will be found a good plan to go through the orchard and tramp the soil down firmly close around the stem of the trees.

Plum trees, especially, will make a better growth and be less injured by pests, especially on the fruit, if they are planted near the poultry house.

Early in the spring thorough drainage is important both in the garden and among the fruit. Some moisture is essential but an excess is, as a rule, detrimental.

Cherries are one of the best varieties of fruits to plant along fences or where the stock is liable to tramp over or less. By proper pruning they can be kept from growing too tall.

It is of no advantage either in the garden or with fruits to plant a large number of varieties; what will keep up a supply to the best advantage is all that is necessary.

Wash out the drinking vessels and clean off the feeding-boards every day or two. Having these clean will aid materially in keeping the fowls healthy, while neglect tends to breed disease.

Poultry manure can be used to a good
