LIVE STOCK AND DAIRY.

SOME SEASONABLE SUGGESTIONS.

DON'T WAIT for the State and Federal Governments to help you do something any intelligent man should have done five years ago. Go to greasing the cattle every two or three weeks, providing you will not (or think you can not) build a new pasture by September 1st, or won't sell off those scrubs you now have before August 15th or September 1st, and do without cattle until May 1st next year, or can't take the cattle out of the old pasture and put them in some other field or stake them out. Three parts of any sort of heavy, non-irritating oil and one part of kerosene will do, but crude petroleum is cheapest and best.

We are convinced that the South loses largely because of a disregard of the best time for the farrowing of the pigs. No pigs should be farrowed between June 1st and September 1st simply because they do better at any other time. In our climate no month is too cold if the sow and pigs have quarters that shelter from wind and water.

Don't breed that bunch of ewes to a grade ram. He is not as good, nor will he give as good returns on his market value or cost as will a pure-bred ram. Kill the scrub sire—the users of scrub sires will kill themselves.

The hogs should have ample shade these hot days, but they do not have to be supplied with water except for drinking. If water may be supplied for them to wallow in without forming a mud hole or cess pool we do not object to it, but we would prefer the hogs had no water to wallow in than to lie in it all the time as they are apt to learn to do in hot weather. The mud hole may keep them free from lice, but we prefer the dipping vat for that purpose.

Dr. A. T. Peters, Director of the Illinois Biological Laboratory, says that mule-footed hogs are not, as often claimed, immune to cholera. Dr. R. A. Craig, of Purdue University, had already found out the same thing. Indeed, the idea of finding a breed or type of hogs immune to cholera is one of those delightful dreams that is not at all likely to be realized.

MANAGEMENT OF THE BOAR.

Usually He is Badly Cared for in the South—He Should Be Kept in a Lot by Himself, and His Feeding Should Have Especial Attention—Points to Observe for Best Results.

Tait Butler.

EITHER THE BEST live stock breeders, the world over, are wrong, or the farmers of the South are mistaken in their ideas and methods of handling the males kept on our farms. We are told by Southern farmers that it is too expensive to keep the boar in a lot by himself. If our experience is worth anything, to keep the boar in a lot by himself is the cheapest way to keep him. If it costs more in feed and care to keep him up by himself, the results are more than enough better to pay for the extra cost. But with proper arrangements we do not believe it costs more in feed or care than to allow him to run with the sows or in the general pasture, providing we propose to keep the boar in proper breeding condition.

It will save feed for both sows and boar if kept free from the excitement which always results when they are run together. Moreover, the boar is less likely to become vicious or unruly or form the habit of breaking down fences. But the chief advantage of keeping the boar by himself is that he is kept in better condition and his produce are better, and that the time the pigs are to arrive is known and the sows are given better care.

The sow is kept six months for her litter and each pig is worth taking some trouble to save. The writer raised 70 pigs out of 73 farrowed by 9 sows one spring, but he was in the farrowing pen when every pig was born. There should be some one on the farm whose time is not too valuable to give to such matters, but to do this it must be known when the sows are bred.

The boar should have shelter from wind and rain and shade to protect him from the hot sun, but with these ends served the cheaper and more open the house the better. His lot should be of sufficient size to furnish him room for exercise and either this lot or another adjoining should furnish a part of his feed by growing crops for grazing. The fence around this lot should be such that he will never seriously think of going through it, for every time he gets out it will require a better fence to confine him afterward. It is useless to ask the average Southern farmer to set aside a lot for the boar and keep him there, apart from all other hogs, but it pays unless the best hog raisers, even those who raise hogs for pork only, are mistaken.

It is also useless to ask the average man to refrain from using a boar
