MONTANA IS THE U. S. OIL CENTER

President of University Explains Geological Conditions in Plain Language.

Butte, July 15.—Professor C. H. Clapp, president of the University of Montana, was the principal speaker at the weekly luncheon of the Rotary club yesterday. He explained in detail geological conditions in Montana which would tend to make the state one of the oil centers of the United States. He was introduced by John O'Neill. The western part of the state is eliminated as an oil-producing center, Professor Clapp explained, because of the many fractures and upheavals that have taken place. The eastern part of the state is also eliminated because the source of the oil is so deep that to bore to the depth required to find oil would be prohibitive at the present time. "The history of the rock formation may be divided into three parts," said Mr. Clapp. "The rocks in the western part of the state may be called the ancient rock, that in the middle of the state may be termed the medieval rock, and that of the eastern part the recent rock."

First Gas Well. "The first gas wells in the state were found in Carbon county in 1897, and the first great gas-producing well in the state was drilled at Havre in 1915. In the Sweetgrass hills there is some gas, but not in paying quantities. In 1916 oil in paying quantities was found in Elk Basin, and the output there is about 80,000 barrels a year. The Cat creek oil field was discovered in 1919, causing a great impetus to the oil industry in the state. Since then many drillings have been made, some of them productive and some not. "To be productive, an oil field must have four conditions. First, there must be a source of oil. This source is usually a greenish black shale, called the Colorado shale. It is rich in organic remains either of plant or animal material. The pressure and heat that have been applied determine the quality of the oil found. There must also be a porous stratum to contain the oil. This stratum may be of sandstone, or limestone, and form a reservoir for the oil. This porous stratum must have an impervious covering, usually of shale, that will prevent the oil and gas from escaping. The whole of this structure must then be covered by what is called a cap rock, which is impervious. In some cases, where this cap rock is fractured, we find that a
