

BOB FORD'S FUNERAL.

A Curious Gathering at the Grave of the Former Outlaw.

"Who the devil's yer plantin'?" The speaker was a small boy, says the

"We're plantin' Bob Ford," said the man on horseback and then began to chant under his breath the poem of "Danny Deaver," which somehow seemed to harmonize with the surroundings.

It was a curious assemblage—a mixture of the goodly and the ugly—and they met in this common place and prayed that the charity which covereth sin might be meted out to them when they, too, should go over the crest of the great divide.

As the horses toiled up the hill they stopped at times to rest, and the mourners brooded the wheels with their feet, lest their carriage run backward.

"Yes, that came king, seven, you lose," and then turning to the lookout: "This feller gave us a good talk, didn't he? God Almighty, but this pack's full of seven."
