ASK MORE MONEY FOR USE OF FOREST ROADS

Washington, D. C. (Special) — Adequate appropriations for forest highways and forest road development were requested by Congressman Wesley A. D'Ewart in a statement to the House appropriations committee last week.

D'Ewart told the committee that strict curtailment of wasteful government practices would permit generous support for worthwhile and necessary federal functions, and at the same time permit budget reductions.

He asked for increases in the amounts appropriated last year for forest highways, forest access roads and trails, and forest resources surveys, all of which he said were badly needed in Montana. The President's budget request for forest highways and roads for 1949 is $15,050,000, compared with $16,300,000 appropriated for the current year.

D'Ewart asked also for adequate appropriations to assure continued development of the Rural Electrification Administration program in Montana, for the continuation of the campaign against foot-and-mouth disease, and for the water facilities program of the Farmers' Home administration.

LIBBY MARCH OF DIMES TOTAL MOST IN HISTORY

"We did so want to hit the one thousand dollar mark," said W. J. Anderson, chairman of the Libby March of Dimes collection. The total received was most gratifying but fell short of the goal by $4.05 with $995.95 being collected in the Libby district.

This is the most ever collected in the Libby district, according to Miss Mildred Buck.

POLE TREATING PLANT

The oil in the big tanks. The oil is contained in the upper Rueping or working tank, there being a Rueping tank for each retort. These tanks are 110 feet in length with an inside diameter of eight feet, and each has a capacity of 41,000 gallons. The poles in the retort have the moisture removed before the preservative is forced into the wood by literally boiling them in the oil which causes the water in the wood to vaporize and flash off. The water vapors are then condensed and trapped and a tally made of the amount of water removed from the poles, which indicates the percentage of moisture content. When this content is at or near 25% to 30% the poles are considered seasoned.

After the poles are seasoned the preservative is forced into them by pressures up to 175-lbs. to the square inch. An accurate tally of the amount of preservative forced into the wood is kept by the pressure metering tanks, which are approximately 23 feet high and of seven feet internal diameter, with a capacity of 5,000 gallons. The Boulton process of seasoning consists of boiling the poles under vacuum, in preservatives at temperatures averaging about 210 degrees F. and a vacuum of approximately 24 to 26 inches causes the moisture in the poles to vaporize and be liberated at a rapid rate. This causes the drying action, or seasoning.

When the poles are seasoned the retorts are left full of oil. They are disconnected from all other tanks except the metering tanks, which are also filled with the preservative. Air pressure forces the oil from the metering tanks into the retorts, where the only place the oil has in which to escape, is into the grain of the poles which insures the actual preservation of the wood.

A large instrument panel board located in the center of the ground floor, gives an accurate picture at all times of what is going on in the plant. It furnishes a record of all temperatures up to 220 degrees F. and pressures from 26 or 28 inches of vacuum to 175-lbs. per square inch of pressure.

All tanks are insulated to a depth of two or more inches, which cuts down heat loss to a minimum. All pressure vessels have safety relief valves positioned on them to prevent accumulation of unsafe pressures. The preservative oil is heated by an external heating system which does away with heating coils in the retorts, greatly reducing the fire hazard. Pumps are available for transferring the creosote, and range in capacity from 250 to 1500 gallons per minute. Compressed air is also available for transfer of the oil, with pressure of 175-lbs. per square inch, which is supplied from the compressor at the rate of 533-cu. ft. per minute.

Poles are inspected both before and after they have been treated by inspectors for the customer. The finished pole is tested by increment boring, which determines the depth of penetration of the preservative which should be about one and one-quarter inches. Twenty borings are made on each charge or retort treatment. The Libby plant has an approximate 24-hour capacity for turning out 800 green poles or 1600 seasoned poles.

In addition to the treatment of lodgepole pine, the Libby plant will treat larch, cedar, and fir poles, all of which are produced in this territory. Lumber, timbers, ties and pilings produced here will also be treated in the plant, which plans to do custom treating and treating-in-transit of lumber, poles, piling and ties for producers west of Libby. The first custom treating-in-transit shipments will arrive in Libby within a week. These shipments come from the Spokane area.
