A Strong Southern View.
There are plenty of northern women who come south to live and who never leave the least bit of trouble. This is because they have good manners and do not set themselves up as the censor of the southern women with whom they are thrown. Many of them have a different conception of the negro from the southern women. They may not agree politically with their southern sisters. They have their own ideas of housekeeping, of food preparing and of giving entertainments. No one begrudges them their views, no one would interfere with their methods, no one cares how they manage their households. They get along in the north because they do not try to crowd their own ideas and methods on southern women and put on superior airs and speak contemptuously of southern methods. These people are as much at home in the south as if they were born in the south.

Some of the northern women who come south can doubtless do some things better than some southern women, but the southern women have the advantage over them in other respects. We do not admit that the general advantage is on the side of the north. The idea that southern women sit around the house reading paper back novels when they ought to be attending to their housekeeping is entirely fallacious. The best women in the south busy themselves with the details of housekeeping. They do not cook when they can avoid it, but they know how to cook. The southerner does not want his wife to go into the kitchen. It breaks down her health and makes her a drudge. She is the home maker, not the servant of the household.

The northern woman who is offensive to the south is the one who comes here to "improve" our social usages and meddle with our manner of living, point out the evil of our ways and bend upon us the light of civilization and refinement. This sort of person usually begins by calling socially upon the "colored ladies," admitting these "ladies" to social equality and then lecturing the southern white women for not doing the same thing. Northern women who come south to establish social equality between the races can be assured in advance of social out-laws in the south. - Memphis Commercial Appeal.

A Tribute to American Women.
"Why is it?" said an American lady in London the other day, "that most of you English people will permit in talking the only young woman of 13 or 20, who stays alone at a hotel and is her own protector and chaperon, as the typical American girl? Probably the easiest reply would have been to say that the real Americans are so quiet and ladylike that they attract no attention and that the pushful hotel young lady was taken as the real representative of her countrywomen. It would not have been, however, a fitting answer. There is no such thing as commonplace American women. Their cleverness, wit and bright womanly qualities make them conspicuous. They aim at being real, helpful companions to their husbands and brothers. Perhaps that is why they have the best time of any women on earth. They have earned the position they enjoy in the estimation of their men folk, which made Max O'Rell declare that if he had any future reincarnation to undergo he would be the Great Ruler of the universe to make him an American woman, says the London Telegraph.

However, passing from that, there is really no excuse why the old traditions should linger so obstinately in this country. There are now hundreds of American women permanently resident in our metropolis, and they are supplemented by thousands of their sisters, whose brilliant intellectuality every summer adds something to the charm and brightness of existence on this side of the western ocean. The prominent self-protected American girl exists, but she is not a type. As a real American lady said, "Most of us are neither freaks nor frumps; we're just normal." But that normality is compared with most of our own womanhood, abnormal, and it is our frequent tendency to accept as the type of our neighbor that which differs most widely from ourselves. After all, there is little difference between our national characteristics. What the difference is, was very wittily expressed by the lady quoted above. She declared that both peoples were of most alike. "A meretricious," she said, "is self-conscious" at which some of her hearers seemed inclined to smile, but she went on "and self-confident. The English are self-conscious and shy. There's the whole thing in a nutshell."

Wearing of mourning has altered greatly during the last few years, the time for going about in garbs of woe having been greatly abbreviated, says Woman's Life. Some people wear black longer than others because they were more particularly attached to the late relation or friend. But, putting sentiment aside, the established rules for mourning are as follows: For a widow or widower, two years; for the loss of a parent, 15 months or so; for grand-parents, nine months; after the death of a grown up brother or sister, one year; for a child, according to age, from three to nine months.
