THOMAS HUGHES, the renowned English author comes to America to establish a colonization colony in the Highlands of Tennessee.

WHATEVER there is of an Utopia about the plan consists in the company's undertaking to provide roads, school houses, a church building for all denominations, a town hall, a hotel and a store, for the new settlers, and to put them in communication with a trunk line of railway.

NO saloons or concert halls will be allowed although cricket grounds and English gardens and public parks are provided for in the neighborhood and town.

IT is Mr. Hughes idea, so to administer the settlement that a "jury of his grandchildren" will not find anything to call the present projectors to account for. Such a plan is certainly a good one for any new country.
