Hans P. Freece's Investigation Abroad
Reveals System of Church in Enticing Converts to Utah.

"When the average American amasses a small fortune... the immediate desire was to leave the scenes of toil and struggle... This did not in a large number of cases amount to more than the purchase of a covered wagon. But I saw a poor peasant girl, a young mother, working along the road towards the Promised Land..."

Hans P. Freece went to Europe to investigate the Mormon system of recruiting. He discovered that the Mormon Church had a well-organized system of recruiting converts to Utah. The church used various methods, including financial incentives and religious promises, to attract people to settle in Utah. Freece was able to expose this system of recruiting and bring it to light. He found that the Mormon Church had a network of agents in various countries, who were working to bring people to Utah. Freece was able to uncover the details of this system and bring it to the attention of the public. Freece's work was important in exposing the Mormon system of recruiting and bringing it to light.
