

HARD TO TELL BANKERS FROM VISITING FANS IN THE HOTEL LOBBIES

In Fact, There Is a Suspicion That Most of the Visiting Bankers Are Both.

By Roger Batchelder.

Financiers and baseball fans may have traditionally different aims and ideas, but it is hard to-day to tell which is a banker, which a visiting fan, in the hotel lobbies. In fact, there is suspicion that most of the visitors are both, and that the bankers merely hold their monster convention so that they could find a good excuse to see Babe Ruth try to bust the ball on the nose, or watch the Giants romp around the sacks.

There was much baseball talk in the hotels last night, although it is apparent that interest is not up to standard among the out-of-towners simply because of that trick of psychology which makes a second performance less fruitful of enthusiasm. Last year's excitement has not as yet been duplicated.

Betting has not been conspicuous, although Detective Joe Smith of the Waldorf has received a few commissions by wire, mostly at even money. A. G. Denniston, lead detective of the Waldorf, has placed several thousand dollars, and reports that the betting seems to favor a game by game basis, rather than the result of the series.

The bankers are going to the series in large numbers. An inquiry put to ten men who were selected at random at the convention, brought the rather astounding total of eight prospective patrons at the Polo Grounds, each one of whom was planning to see at least one game. The Yankees were the favorite by a large margin; their clinching of the pennant has caused many who had been on the sidelines to join their cheering section. That situation seems to be prevalent everywhere in hotel circles. While old players naturally follow their favorite teams, and Judge Landis maintains a discreet atmosphere of secrecy in his suite at the Commodore, the rank and file, who have come here for the game's sake, think that the Yankees have enough lightning pitching arms to offset the swarming proclivities of McGraw's batting order. Dick Kinsella, chief Giant scout, who came early from his Illinois home, has officially opened Giant headquarters at the Waldorf, and is shaking hands with all his old friends who agree with his opinion concerning the result.

At the Commodore a large staff of workmen is busy transforming the writing room on the first floor into a newspaper headquarters. The officers of the Baseball Writers' Association of America, comprising the leading reporters of this branch of sport throughout the country, have already arrived, and are planning to open the room for the boys to-night.
