Volunteer State Lives Up to Name in Manning Tennessee

Newest Superdreadnought Gets Native Born Crew in Most Remarkable Recruiting Campaign in Naval History

Many years ago some pioneer parents, with a clear eye on the future, named their sixth child Tennessee. This was the name of the state in which they lived and it was fitting and appropriate for the son they had been waiting for, because Tennessee was the name of the mother's home state. The parents had a great affection for Tennessee, and the choice of the name reflected a deep love for the state from which the mother had come to marry the father. Tennessee was a name of pride and honor, and it was fitting that the son should bear it as a symbol of his heritage and his connection with the land of his ancestors. The parents were proud of Tennessee, and they wanted their son to be proud of the state as well. They wanted him to understand the history and the culture of Tennessee, and they wanted him to feel a sense of belonging to the land that had given him life. They wanted him to be a Tennessee Volunteer, a symbol of the state's strength and spirit.

The Tennessee Volunteer was a symbol of the state's pride and honor, and it was fitting that the son should bear the name as a mark of his connection with the land of his ancestors. The parents were proud of Tennessee, and they wanted their son to be proud of the state as well. They wanted him to understand the history and the culture of Tennessee, and they wanted him to feel a sense of belonging to the land that had given him life. They wanted him to be a Tennessee Volunteer, a symbol of the state's strength and spirit.

In the years that followed, Tennessee grew and prospered, and the son of the pioneer parents went on to lead a life of great accomplishment. He became a leader in the state, and he fought for the rights of the people and the land he loved. He was a Tennessee Volunteer, true to the name and true to the spirit of the state.

The Tennessee Volunteer was a symbol of the state's pride and honor, and it was fitting that the son should bear the name as a mark of his connection with the land of his ancestors. The parents were proud of Tennessee, and they wanted their son to be proud of the state as well. They wanted him to understand the history and the culture of Tennessee, and they wanted him to feel a sense of belonging to the land that had given him life. They wanted him to be a Tennessee Volunteer, a symbol of the state's strength and spirit.

In the years that followed, Tennessee grew and prospered, and the son of the pioneer parents went on to lead a life of great accomplishment. He became a leader in the state, and he fought for the rights of the people and the land he loved. He was a Tennessee Volunteer, true to the name and true to the spirit of the state.