A SLEEPING CAR COMEDY.

A middle-aged married couple have turned in next to me, having boarded the train at a way station. They have evidently hurried and are out of humor, for the wife is fretful and excited, and the husband growls above his breath in this style:

"Now, I'll just let you didn't put my night shirt in!"

"Shush!" It's in the basket in the corner," replies the woman.

"I've looked in the basket and 'tain't there. I s'pose you put it in at the bottom, under the vittals."

"In the vittals, indeed. Why, John, what on e-a-r-l-h are you doing?"

"I'm looking for my shirt."

"Don't! That's the wrong basket. You've gone and spilt them pickles all over the bed! I never see such a man!"

"Never mind, Mary, you needn't tell the whole car." This in a whisper peculiar to the stage.

"Looking for your old shirt in the dinner basket! I don't see what anybody wants a night-shirt for on a railroad, anyhow," retorted the indignant female; and there was a whirring sound which indicated that she had pitched the missing article in his face just in time to choke off a wicked rejoinder.

"Sposin' the cars were to run off the track?" added she. "You'd be a nice picture wadin' out of a swamp or rollin' down a bank in that, wouldn't you?"

"I'd be just as comfortable and party as you in that—"

"Shush! You'll disgrace both of us with your tongue." (Whispering.)

"My tongue! Well, d—n me, Mary, if—"

"There, now, you'r cursing me—you—you—" (Breaks off to sob.)

There's where she had him.

I fancied shortly after hearing the resonant and agreeable sound of a kiss, but perhaps it was only the angels, and I dropped off to sleep again. On the following day I saw the same couple seated opposite, munching pickles and fried chickens at intervals, as docile and happy a couple as anybody may wish to see.—Baltimore Bulletin.
