REJUVENATING AN OLD PARTY

AFTER but a little more than a year in control the Republican party finds itself breaking up. Dissension among the leaders is apparent, even in Nevada, and while the glory gained by the Republicans at the last election is on the wane the Democrats are preparing to present a solid front in November.

The withdrawal of Wingfield from the office of national committeeman from Nevada follows the threat the angel of the party in Nevada is alleged to have made, that he would resign in the event that George Springmeyer was recommended by Senator Tasker Oddie for the office of United States district attorney for Nevada.

In California there is still greater disagreement in Republican ranks. Robert H. McCormack, friend of Senator Samuel Shortridge, has been discharged from the office of prohibition law prosecutor and on top of that comes a meeting of San Francisco Republicans and the selection of Charles C. Moore to oppose Hiram Johnson in the Republican senatorial campaign.

The charge that Johnson is in alignment with William Randolph Hearst is made by the San Francisco Journal and the combination does not suit such men as Marshal Hale, Chester Rowell, Ralphy Hathorne, Marshall Stimson, and others of those who years ago were most prominent in launching Johnson as a representative of progressive Republicanism.

On top of the rebuke for the present Republican administration throughout the East in the election at primaries of Gifford Pinchot and other Progressives, it appears that the dissatisfaction among Republican voters is pronounced, and it would not be at all surprising if a new Progressive party is not in the making.

The appearance of a leader seems to be all that is necessary.

THE WHIPPING POST AGAIN

SOME time ago the Appeal commented on the use of the whipping post in Delaware and in European countries. A number of letters poured into this office and some of them were harsh.

Such critics will probably be surprised at the statement in this connection of William Pinkerton, head of one of the greatest detective agencies in the world, now attending the convention of the International Association of Police Chiefs in San Francisco. His remarks are terse, emphatic and conclusive.

"The man who robs with violence, the house prowler, the stick-up man, should be lashed forty times. They all dread that. I have talked to dozens of criminals who have told me that they would rather serve twenty years in the penitentiary than take forty lashes across the back."

Mr. Pinkerton's business is the protection of society against criminals of all sorts; he comes of a family experienced in that work, and if anyone knows the relative merits of the various penal processes, it should be himself.

He maintains, first, that the most frightful crime wave he has ever known is now raging in this country.

Second, that the parole law is an utter failure.

Third, that criminals are more vicious than they have ever been.

Fourth, that results have proved the public whipping post and pillory to be the only efficient remedies in such an emergency.

LILLIAN RUSSELL

UNTIL the death of Lillian Russell, one hardly realized that she was perhaps the best-known woman in America. One might conceive of people so remote from the clamor of our press as not to have heard of Mary Pickford, but scarcely anyone to whom Lillian Russell's name was unknown. Even to the children of the present generation, who know of her accomplishments only by hearsay, it is hauntingly familiar. Those who were children twenty years ago also remember her as one of the most vivid splendors of their childhood, and can recall with diamond-like clearness the beautiful features they admired in the theatre, or on the majestic cigar signs of those days.

A reason for her high place in the affections of America is that she was profoundly American, in the complete and effortless way of inland America in her time. It was so cardinal a thing in her nature that people rarely spoke of it, recognizing it intuitively rather than consciously. Her active work in the Red Cross and Liberty Loan campaigns attracted less notice than that of many other women, probably because no one could have imagined Lillian Russell refusing an opportunity for patriotic service. Famous both in England and America, she was a splendid example of the Anglo-Saxon type that has so signally lost its dominance of recent years in American art and in many other departments of American life.

She was a great singer and a great actress, but a very great American.

A PASSING REVIEW

William Kearney for governor.

That is the first bit of the Republican slate that has become known since the word was sent forth that the Republicans would have a full ticket in the field for congressional and state offices at the coming elections.

Kearney is said to have the support of the Wingfield faction in his party, which means that Miller must be content to seek individual support and Stewart must be content to do likewise, in case he should again change his mind and become a candidate.

Something new in campaigning was offered the Republican voters this week when Mrs. Lydia Adams-Williams used a circus as the vehicle for getting her campaign "across."

The Humboldt Star tells the following of her mingling with the clowns and elephants:

Mrs. Lydia Adams-Williams, Nevada's single woman candidate for the United States senate, a Republican, and the first to declare her political aspirations, came to Winnemucca as a member of the Gentry circus train contingent. She joined the outfit in Carson City, rode from there to Winnemucca with the circus aggregation, making her stops conform to those of the show. Reno, Fallon, Lovelock, and then Winnemucca, and in each place she moved about among the people and made her plea for support. When the train moved Mrs. Williams was one of the party.

During the performances in Winnemucca Mrs. Williams shared honors with the clown brigade in creating amusement for the crowd present. She distributed well printed doggers, showing herself as she was a couple of decades ago.

If fortune should play a prank in Republican circles and give the woman now appearing daily within the hippodrome the Republican nomination for the senate, political dope and dopsters in Nevada would be much upset. Stranger things even than this have happened.

Mayor Harry Stewart of Reno, who concocted the scheme of calling the Republican hosts throughout the state to Reno for the purpose of sounding out sentiment in his favor for the governorship and who was beaten by the announcement of Johnnie Miller, has, it is said, thought of a plan to have candidates endorsed at the state convention to be held at Reno next Tuesday.

Stewart, so the report goes, has been sending letters to the delegates to the convention, urging them to discuss among themselves the various candidates.

This is taken to mean that Stewart or some of his cohorts will attempt to seek endorsement for some of the favorites.

The absence of Senator Key Pittman from the Democratic convention next week will take some of the edge off the meeting, for Pittman was expected to have something very forceful to say.

William McAdoo will be there, however, and McAdoo is an interesting speaker. His reception in Nevada, too, might have some influence on his state of mind regarding a presidential candidacy two years from now.

There were a few politicians at the American Legion convention held here this week, but only a few.

Col. C. H. Moore, candidate for congress on the Republican ticket, was a delegate from Reno. H. W. Huskey, Democratic aspirant for the same office, also stuck close to the convention, although he is not a member of the Legion. Congressman Arentz was here also.

Aside from a few candidates for county offices in their home counties, who are delegates, the three named represented the total vote-seekers at the ex-service men's meeting.

Chandler appears to be the man on the inside track for the organization's support for the Republican nomination for United States senator.

Not much has been given publicity on the relative strength of Arentz, Buol, and Roberts with the party leaders, but it appears that Chandler tops them all.

Rumor has it in Carson today that R. P. Burris, known more familiarly throughout the state as "Bubbles," will make his announcement for the Democratic nomination for secretary of state. "Bubbles" was formerly deputy in the office of Secretary of State George Brodigan, but was relieved a few months ago when he and Brodigan could not agree.

He has been approached by his friends regarding a candidacy for the office of secretary of state, but so far had been rather uncommunicative.

He hailed originally from Goldfield and has a large following at that place. He could also draw strength from Reno and has friends here who would work for his election.

The reported decision of Gilbert C. Ross, present state bank examiner, to get into the race for congress on the Democratic ticket did not come as a surprise to the friends of Ross. It has been known for several years that Ross cherished an ambition to represent his state at Washington and he evidently believes the time is ripe for making an announcement that he will run.

Ross served as lieutenant-governor. He is known in every city and town in the state and there is no denying that his political sagacity will make him a serious contender for the congressional honors.

HE TORE PADDING FROM PADDED CELL

Battista Mendoza was cast into a dungeon at the Nye county jail two nights ago for his own protection as he was fighting drunk and likely to run against the fist of some roughneck who did not understand the language as she is spoken around Mexicali, says the Tonopah Times. Mendoza could not appreciate the friendly nature of the act and he whooped it up with a spigoty eloquence that caused him to be removed to a padded cell. In the morning the prisoner was subdued and turned loose. Some hours later when the trustees went in to clean up the cell they found the interior clawed and chewed as though a rabid coyote had been caged. Sheriff Thomas said nobody could put it over the county in that shape and he ordered the wildcat returned forthwith. The prisoners on showing was directed to dig up $10 to pay the cost of repairs and on producing was turned loose with a warning.
