The school election today is having but little attention, and would have had less but for an effort to drag politics into it. The matter of politics is bad enough in municipal affairs, but to drag into school affairs is ridiculous, and especially so when it was understood in the spring that school officers should be divided equally. It is a question kept quiet until the morning of election.

The opposition to the army canteen comes from persons who have no knowledge whatever of military affairs, and its indorsement comes from experienced officers who know all about soldiers. The trouble with ultra temperance reformers is that they favor all of the worst evils incident to lawless intoxication rather than a sensible acknowledgment of the inevitable force of appetite and a practical regulation of the drink habit under the authority of the state or a well tested military code. It appears much better to them that soldiers should seek outside of their campgrounds—where they are certain to do—the means of excessive intoxication with all of their disgraceful and wasteful consequences, than that they should be organized to regulate their drink habit, with a moderation and order reasonable which prevent excess.
