BEHEADED AT HIS DOOR.

Aged Farmer Could Not Hear Flying Express.

Clayton, N. Y. May 11.—When Geo. Baird, an old farmer, walked out of his house to cross to one of his fields this morning his wife and two daughters stood in the doorway, watching his retreating figure. The old man had to pass over the tracks of the West Jersey and Seashore railroad, which run within a few feet of his house, and as he is very deaf his children usually look out for him as he approaches the dangerous point. They still had their eyes on him, when the morning express from Cape May came rushing up the track at a mile a minute clip. They screamed a warning, and the engineer blew a mighty blast on his whistle but the old man did not hear. As he got on the tracks the flying train struck him and hurled his body far ahead and then struck it again.

Before the eyes of his loved ones the old man was decapitated, his head rolling away from the body, and he probably never knew what struck him.

"Booh" Is Worth $1,000.

New Haven, Conn., May 11.—Eva Bartholomew is given just $1,000 damages in her suit against Charles D. Parmelee, who jumped out of the bus and yelled "booh" and frightened her so that she will be practically speechless for life. The end of the famous "booh" case came today when the decision of the judge was announced. Miss Bartholomew says she is incapacitated for school teaching as a result of Parmelee's practic l joke.

A Very Remarkable Remedy.

"It is with a good deal of pleasure and satisfaction that I recommend Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy," says Druggist A. W. Sawtelle of Hartford, Conn. "A lady customer, seeing the remedy exposed for sale on my show case, said to me: 'I really believe that medicine saved my life the past summer while at the shore,' and she became so enthusiastic over its merits that I at once made up my mind to recommend it in the future. Recently a gentleman came into my store so over come with colic pains that he sank at once to the floor. I gave him a dose of this remedy which helped him. I repeated the dose and in fifteen minutes he left my store smilingly informing me that he felt as well as ever." Sold by City Drug Store and F. J. Ramsey.

IN THE WILDS OF ALASKA

An All-American Route Discovered by Lieutenant Herron.

FIVE MONTHS' TRAVEL IN SNOW.

Deserted by Indian Guides, the Expedition Was Caught in the Toils of Winter's Ice and Snow—Discovered Another Great Mountain Besides Mount McKinley, 20,000 Feet High.

The report of Lieutenant Joseph S. Herron, Eighth cavalry, who, with his small command, was reported to be lost in the vicinity of the McKinley range, Alaska, in the fall and winter of 1900, is about to be published by the war department, writes the Washington correspondent of the New York Sun. A portion of the territory traversed by Lieutenant Herron and his men was never before pressed by the feet of white men, and the narrative of that officer represents the heroic efforts of a small party in unknown regions against almost insurmountable obstacles, deserted by guides, caught in the toils of winter's ice and snow and deprived of transportation and hampered by scarcity of food. It was only in the early spring of 1900 that intelligence reached the war department that the gallant band had arrived in safety at Fort Gibson.

After engaging in some explorations in and about Cook inlet during the months of May and June, 1899, Lieutenant Herron and the men who were to accompany him into heretofore unexplored regions were landed by steamboat at the head of navigation of the Keechatno. From this point began the series of overland explorations to the Yukon, the object being to discover the most practicable route to the junction of that river with the Tanana. The detachment was composed, in addition to Lieutenant Herron, of five men. Fifteen pack horses carried rations to Oct. 31. Considerable trouble was encountered in getting Indian guides. Two Indian guides were finally engaged, and on July 1, 1899, the expedition began its journey.

The first objective was to get through the Alaskan range, a mass of enormous peaks and glaciers about 70 miles wide, extending across Alaska and constituting the chief barrier to the interior. The expedition consumed the entire month in exploring these mountains. Moose and bear were occasionally encountered, which gave the expedition fresh meat. On July 22 the crest of the divide was crossed, and the expedition started down the other side. East of the divide the drainage is into the Pacific ocean, west of it into the Bering sea. The latter is closed by ice in winter, while the Pacific ocean is open.

In the latter part of July the Indians deserted and went back to the coast. This proved a severe blow to the expedition. Thereafter Lieutenant Herron traveled by the compass and sun. With September came frosts that killed the grass and leaves, and the horses were fed on flour. A great deal of food was subsequently lost during the month by accidents of one kind or another from which men and horses suffered. One night a big brown bear knocked down a cache and ate 50 pounds of bacon. Fortunately an Indian crossed the bear's trail and killed it, and members of the expedition evened up matters by eating bruin in turn.

For two months Lieutenant Herron was compelled to remain among the Indians before he could figure a way out to civilization. In the meantime he was not idle. He learned the language of the tribe he was among in order that he might gain all possible knowledge of the country yet to be explored and by so doing worked the rescue of himself and men. In the meantime the horses had either died natural deaths or had been killed and eaten. The horse blankets carried by the party were made into clothing, socks and mitts. Their food, when they could get it, was moose, beaver and fish. The Indians were hospitable, but required careful management.

In the latter part of November Lieutenant Herron, with four Indians as guides, resumed the exploration of the last 171 miles on snowshoes, cutting and blazing a trail and mapping the country as he went along. Nine dogs and three sleds hauled such impedimenta as remained to the expedition. During the extremely cold nights that ensued the men bivouacked on the ground, digging through the snow, using their snowshoes as shovels, piling shelters of spruce trees around them and keeping the fire going all night to keep from being frozen to death. It was only when they found a band of Indians camped at Coshaget, on the Tanana, that such luxuries as bread, butter and tea passed their lips.

At 3:30 on Dec. 11, 1899, the little band of hardy explorers reached their objective point, the junction of the Tanana and Yukon rivers, after having passed 5 months and 11 days on the trail. The total number of miles traveled was 1,000, all on foot.

In his observations on the country traversed Lieutenant Herron says he should judge the Kuskokwim to be navigable for large steamboats as far as the Echeatno and for small steamboats as far as the Tatlathno. The general characteristics of interior Alaskan rivers are strong currents, great erosions and sedimentary deposits, shifting channels and rapid rise in spring. They are frozen from about Nov. 1 to May 1 and are open to navigation about June, July, August and part of September. The floating ice at the mouth of the Yukon usually delays navigation there until about July 1. The highest water occurs in May.

In addition to Mount McKinley, celebrated as the highest mountain in North America, Lieutenant Herron claims to have discovered a second great mountain in this range 20,000 feet high, which he has named Mount Foraker, after the senior Ohio senator. The Suschitna Indians call the mountain "Bolshoi," which in Russian means big. The Kuskokwims call them "Dianz-ee" and the Tananas and Yukons "Din-alee." The all-American route passes near Caldwell and Fleishman glaciers, but does not touch them. At one time they ground out the valleys and the pass which now opens the way through the mountains. The Indian trail to Tyoonok runs through the pass between the mountains Hatay and Snoedee. The discovery of this pass adds to Lieutenant Herron's route the advantage of a direct all land connection with Tyoonok. This, with a short extension along the coast to a point below the west Fork, and, such as Kustatan, makes possible an open harbor free of ice all the year round. Simpson pass in the McKinley range opens a way to the Yukon, Kuskokwim and Cape Nome countries. Lieutenant Herron judges the pass to be from about a quarter to about a half mile wide.

It is of slight grade, free from glaciers, safe from snowslides, the elevation on the crest 3,000 feet above sea level, and is approached by wide valleys. It is a wide gap cut out in former ages by the Fleishman glacier, which has receded and now stands back out of the pass.

The primary object of Lieutenant Herron's expedition was to find an available all American route into the center of Alaska from the open harbor of Cook inlet, and he is firmly convinced that he has found it. If true, and no one has proof to the contrary, he has performed a great service to his country and especially to the future commercial interests of Alaska. He claims for his route the following advantages: First, it pierces the center of Alaska, and, second, it touches navigable points and winter trails on the most important river systems of Alaska—viz, Suchitna, Kuskokwim, Tanana and Yukon—and as a consequence taps the country drained by them, the most resourceful and promising of Alaska and which connects with Nome.

THE FILIPINOS AT HOME.

A Returned Soldier Says They Are Industrious and Eager to Learn.

Sergeant Thomas H. McClung of the Thirtieth United States infantry, who traversed the greater portion of the island of Luzon during a two years' campaign against the Philippine insurgents, is at home and gives some interesting accounts of conditions existing in the archipelago. In speaking to the St. Louis Globe-Democrat correspondent at Flora, Ills., Sergeant McClung said:

"The people of the United States have a misconception of the character of the inhabitants of the Philippines. Instead of being a race of savages, the major portion of the population is intelligent and well advanced in civilization, considering the chaotic state of affairs which has existed for ages. As a people they are very fond of music, and every town of any consequence has a band. The Tagalog tribe, which predominates in Luzon, represents the better type of the native Filipino, and the people are remarkably well educated. In many instances the children not only read and write Tagalog, but Spanish as well, and gladly improve the opportunity of learning English. The better classes welcome American rule, and especially the property owners, who recognize the benefits to be derived from a settled condition of affairs.

"The roving bands of marauders who are causing most of the trouble at the present time have always infested the islands, and the better class of natives fear them as much as do the other residents."

Sergeant McClung is a veteran of the Spanish-American war, having served in the First Mississippi volunteer infantry.
