POULTRY NOTES

It is not too early to begin selecting the breeders for next season from among the young stock. While you are about it, it is just as well to begin studying the older birds that will go into the breeding pens. It is in the mating of the birds that the breeder shows his real knowledge of the business. He must, first of all, have a fixed ideal in mind. There must be nothing hazy about this ideal. It must stand out as clear cut as a properly-timed photograph. He must know his breed and the points where it is weak and which, therefore, must be strengthened.

We have little patience with the theory that one should avoid the heavy layers for the breeding pen, on the ground that their eggs are liable to be productive of weak chicks. Our own experience is the reverse. Good layers are invariably strong and vigorous, if they are not forced too heavy for egg production, and when they come anywhere near the desired type they will be selected for our breeding pens. Our experience has been that it is easy to correct the shape of a bird through breeding, but it is impossible to increase the laying capacity, except by breeding good layers. We would rather introduce blood from a hen of unusual capacity for laying and run the chance on breeding out her undesirable shape. In picking the heavy layer, we would not make the mistake that our ancestors did with the dairy cows. The cow that would give a lot of milk at freshening time was most eagerly sought and a great many consistent straight-through-the-year milkers were unappreciated, when their yearly production would be twice that of the heavy milker at freshening. It is the pullet that begins laying in October or November and keeps at it straight through the winter that is most apt to develop into the long-distance laying hen—Exchange.

The degree of civilization can be reckoned by the degree of humanity towards animals.—Pierre de Coubertain.

On November 2, 1916, a very generous gentleman was passing the St. Helens schoolhouse when he stopped his wagon and began giving apples to all of the children who were present. After he had given apples to all who cared for them he drove on. Thanks to you, Mr. Larson. THE SCHOOL CHILDREN WHO ATE THE APPLES.

CARD OF THANKS

To the many kind friends who ministered to us and aided us in our hour of bereavement, we wish to express our heartfelt thanks. The beautiful flowers which covered our little one's grave are deeply appreciated, and we thank the friends who so kindly remembered us. MR. AND MRS. W. A. SODERBERG.
