Necessity for Storage Reservoirs in the West.

A significant indication of the agricultural progress of the West is the growth of public opinion toward the fullest possible use of the streams for irrigation, and especially toward the conservation of the winter and spring flood waters which now run to waste. A recent report received by the United States Geological Survey, in its study of the country's water resources, from Mr. A. L. Fellows, resident hydrographer of the Survey for the State of Colorado, throws interesting light upon the water situation now existing in that State.

The urgent necessity for storage of water, says Mr. Fellows, was never more fully demonstrated than by the great scarcity of water in Colorado during the present irrigation season. The gagings of the streams by the United States Geological Survey show lower stages than have ever been known before at the same season, and the fact that a winter flow of considerable magnitude, although less than the normal, might have been stored if reservoirs had been available, and the further fact that a number of floods of short duration, resulting from violent rain storms, were left unutilized, have opened the eyes of irrigators as never before to the necessity for storage. Although the shortage has been most marked upon the eastern slope of the Rockies, the same is true to a less extent upon the western slope. Whereas in the eastern streams there has been practically no high stage, water being taken in the irrigation ditches before any high stage could be observed in the streams, while reaching a stage of considerable run-off, have nevertheless attained their maxima at early periods, and have subsided quickly, so that low-water stages have come from one to two months earlier than usual.

These facts, taken in connection with the prevalent high charges for water and the increasing value of land susceptible of irrigation, have resulted in filings being made upon a great many reservoir sites throughout the State.
