ASTORIA'S INTEREST IN THE MATTER.

The abdication of Villard is a nine days' wonder to the northwest. It is generally understood that he resigned because he had to, and that his resignation means a change of policy.

Just how the change affects Astoria is difficult to determine until the new policy of the transportation companies is announced. On the premise that Villard's power is broken, it is safe to predicate that his withdrawal will be our gain.

Astoria's relations with Villard were never cordial. When he came out here in October, '81, he gave us to understand that he wanted nothing said either way; that he was not prepared to negotiate, and didn't recognize that there was such a place.

Astoria's attitude toward him was that of a community that had valuable rights, great natural advantages, permanent attributes of prosperity, and sufficient justification for prosperous existence without meretricious aids to inflated growth.

Nor do we feel any exultation, for the situation to us is one of concern. There is considerable idle gabble indulged in by irresponsible creatures concerning "policy," while the real interests of our city demand unity of action.

It is within the limits of the present probability that the Oregon Transcontinental shall disintegrate; it has been a bond of union between the O. R. & N., and the Northern Pacific; should that overshadowing luminary be eclipsed, the lesser orbs would swing each in their several orbits, and it is evident that the policy of the N. P. R. R. would as inevitably tend to aid the Sound ports as the policy of the O. R. & N. tends to aid Portland—and, inevitably Astoria.

And this brings the subject back to the same ground that THE ASTORIAN took a year ago, viz: that on the proper improvement of the bar depends, largely, our prosperity. That the completion of the N. P. R. R. indirectly hastened the work is manifest; that the recent dethroning of Villard further forwards it is as evident.

As to Astoria's connection with the railroad management it may be briefly said that her position is well defined; there is no mistaking the attitude she assumes. Overtures from the other side are in order and may be considered. It may, however, not be wholly out of place to suggest that as citizens of Astoria there are other considerations of equal importance with the railroad and navigation questions.

LEAP-YEAR is drawing dangerously nigh, and many a bashful bachelor is debating whether he will depart for regions unknown or run the risk of being captured by some determined maiden who is bound to assert her rights.

It is not improbable that Mr. Parnell's critics will hurl at him their shafts because of his acceptance of the gift of nearly two hundred thousand dollars which his countrymen all over the world have just given him.

A PRIVATE dispatch to New York from a London financier says the origin of Villard's wealth consisted of some $200,000 which a brother of Sir Wilfred Lawson entrusted to him for investment in solid American securities.

MARRIED. In Upper Astoria, Dec. 20th, by Rev. J. Hollick, Isaac Melin and Miss Louisa Unstalo.
