DEATHS OF A DAY

EDWARD J. HALL
Vice President of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company.

WATKINS, N. Y., Sept. 15.—Edward J. Hall, father of the long distance telephone and a vice president of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, died here yesterday. He came here from New York some weeks ago for his health. Mr. Hall's death was sudden and unexpected.

Although Edward Julius Hall was a leading personality in the comparatively brief history of the development of the Bell telephone commercially and more than any other individual, active in the spreading of the long distance telephone throughout the country, his name was next to unknown to the public at large because of a lifelong aversion to publicity.

On New Year's Day, 1885, Theodore N. Vail, now president of "Tel. & Tel.," held a conference, as a result of which Mr. Hall took over the management of the new company just organized, the American Telephone and Telegraph Company. A year earlier, in 1884, an experimental long distance line had been opened between New York and Boston. Mr. Hall took up the development of the long distance telephone line enthusiastically and with great energy and industry.
