

THE GREAT BATTLE AT NASHVILLE!

Terrific Charges of Our Troops. THE REBELS DRIVEN EVERYWHERE. PRISONERS AND GUNS CAPTURED.

Casualties and Incidents of the Fight.

Yesterday morning the city was on the qui vive. Troops passed through the streets during the night, and there were rumors of an advance by our troops. The day was ushered in with the booming of cannon from the various forts around the city, and a battle seemed to be impending almost over our heads. A thick fog for a time obscured the view of our line of defense, from which, however, could plainly be seen, every few seconds, the firing from Fort Negley and our batteries from the river on the east. Between nine and ten o'clock the mist cleared before a brisk wind, and occasional bursts of sunshine imparted a healthy gleam to the sun's exposure. At this early hour we saw, of course, very few of the ranks of the wounded. We publish a very imperfect list, hoping that it may be of service to our readers.

Our list of wounded will probably not exceed four hundred. Our cavalry suffered very severely, the men exhibiting an imprudent impetuosity to charge, and incur the loss of exposure. At this early hour we saw, of course, very few of the ranks of the wounded. We publish a very imperfect list, hoping that it may be of service to our readers.

A remarkable instance of fortitude was related to us yesterday by a young soldier, a young soldier who in action was slain in the abdomen by a bullet which received a mortal wound. He still held his arms and legs in a rigid posture, and he lay on his back, but never uttered a word. "And then," said he, "I had to give up." And, no doubt, the valor of his fall was probably no power to his comrades.

The events of the day only briefly summed up in this—We acted on the aggressive, attacked the rebels, drove them from the city, and on every point, until at nightfall their left wing was at right angles with the position held at the morning. Took no guns, over 100 and very probably more, and killed and wounded them they did not. All the advantages went clearly on our side. We have held our entire line of works and driven the enemy from a large portion of his intrenchments. Still the battle was kept up till dark, when—

The rebels made a last effort to break through our lines, but were repulsed. The rebels made a last effort to break through our lines, but were repulsed. The rebels made a last effort to break through our lines, but were repulsed.
