"Don't make a scene in public, for heaven's sake, Rosalys!" Feeling that he had spoken too brutally, he suddenly paused, and changed: "I am sorry, little woman, if I was cross! But things have combined to harass me lately. Of course we won't part from one another in anger."

Jim glanced at her straight profile with its full underlip and firmly-curved chin, at the lashes on either lid, and the glossy brown hair twisted in coils underher hat. But the sight of this loveliness, now all his own, failed to arouse the old emotions. He simply contemplated her approvingly from an artistic point of view.

They had reached the gateway, and she placed her hand on his arm.

She thanked him in a cold voice again, and with a last handshake and a smile that hovered on sorrow, left him and drove away towards Belgravia. Once or twice later on they met; the next interview being shorter and sadder perhaps than the last. The one that followed it ended in bitterness. "This had better be our long good-by, I suppose?" said she.

"Perhaps it had. " * * You seem to be always looking out for causes of reproach, Rosalays. I don't

She started as in a spasm. A momentary remorse seized him. He realized that he had been betrayed in speaking as no man of kindly good feeling could speak. He made a tardy, scarcely gracious apology, and they parted. A few days afterwards he wrote a letter full of penitence for having hurt her, and she answered almost affectionately But each knew that their short-lived romance was dead as the wind flowers that had blossomed at its untimely birth.
