KEEPING GERMAN PRISONERS IS COSTING AMERICA VERY LITTLE

(By David Lawrence.) (Copyright, 1918, by New York Evening Post.)

Hot Springs, N. C., July 1--Ting-Tau and a brass band and a German internment camp in the mountains of North Carolina do not seem offhand to have any connection with each other, but such are the vicissitudes of war that the United States government is today taking care of thirty-six musicians who played for the German garrison at Kaito-Chow before it fell into the hands of the Japanese.

The Germans had the foresight to have themselves enrolled as members of the Red Cross. Consequently when the Japanese captured the place, the German band asked to be returned to Germany as non-combatants, a request with which the Japanese complied. So they started across the Pacific and stopped in the United States en route to Germany.

This country was neutral at the time, and our department of state made inquiry of the British government concerning safe passage across the Atlantic, but here the British said nay and wouldn't guarantee anything, so the Germans decided to sojourn in America.

They went from city to city giving concerts and were enjoying themselves. But when war broke out between the United States and Germany, they were promptly interned, for besides being musicians they are chemists and bomb experts and persons gifted in occupations that might, if practiced, produce considerable mischief. They are the much less concern with their occasional band concerts inside the camp.

Unique Community. There's probably not another community like this in the country. Besides having a fine brass band and an orchestra and mandolin and guitar players, there are doctors, dentists, tailors, plumbers, electricians, gas fitters, botanists, naturalists, chemists, cooks, bricklayers and carpenters. In fact, most of these Germans seem to be carpenters, judging by the little houses they have built. They have achieved the most artistic effects by building a row of a dozen or more arbor-like structures furnished about and adorned with little garden beds. It constitutes a miniature German village, and the Germans have selected a mayor, to whom all plans must be submitted before anybody is permitted to erect another house that is German if Presumably it wouldn't be German if there weren't a number of "Verboten" signs about and with cynical humor the occupants have put up about every kind of prohibition they have ever known from "Keep off the grass" to "No loitering allowed" and "Smoking strictly prohibited." And if there's one thing which the Germans seem to be doing morning, noon and night, it's smoking. There are pipes of every size and odor.

The little houses which they have constructed are crudely furnished with odd bits of furniture, lumber and debris. The Germans rummaged in the big piles of rubbish which they found back of the old, rundown hotel house and cleaned it up. Everything from chimney bricks to lattices and condensed milk cans seemed to have a use.

How They Live. One man hammered out about a hundred cans, and covered his hut with a simple exterior, which glistens in the sun. Another fashioned a windmill for himself. There he sits most of the day reading. Another was content with a box-shaped house about two feet wide and three feet long, no longer hardly than a doll's house, but he put a big sign "tailor shop" on the outside and repairs clothes for his compatriots.

Another occupies himself all day in a similar workshop, making fancy boxes and carving souvenirs. Still another busies himself at the easel, drawing marine views. I saw two naturalists mounting all the many kinds of bugs and caterpillars and butterflies that have invaded the camp since spring. Another man proudly showed me glass jars full of rattlesnakes he had caught. All the Germans seem to be fond of animal pets. A year ago somebody bought a pair of rabbits. And now the camp is full of them. There are plenty of chickens and dogs, and the Germans I saw were trying to teach the rabbits, chickens and dogs either to understand German or do tricks--they seemed to be perseveringly attentive to the teacher.

Most of the little houses--and I believe the crews built better looking ones than the officers--stand on the edge of French Broad river, with beautiful shade trees forming a natural screen against the sun.

The ground is very fertile, and practically everything anybody wants to grow can be raised here. Consequently, all the vegetables needed by the camp have been produced by the Germans. Some of them have asked the government whether they can be allowed $30 apiece for these summer houses, as they will be splendid recreation places for the American wounded, who are in the quarters in the reconstruction hospital to be erected on the camp grounds, beginning July 1. Theoretically, the Germans say, it is their property, but the ground beneath it wasn't, so their request probably will not be granted. The Germans will be lucky if the camp commanders at Fort Oglethorpe let them build similar cottages.

$5 For Tobacco. As a matter of fact, the Germans wouldn't have much use for $50 if they got it. They receive $5 a month from the Swiss legation in Washington, which cares for German diplomatic affairs in this country, and that $5 is more than enough to buy tobacco. Incidentally one would suppose that the whole project of keeping the Germans is expensive, but it is ridiculously cheap.

In the first place, the cooks, stewards and kitchen helpers are all interned Germans, though they get a nominal fee from our government for their work. Then food is economically handled. The Germans wash their own clothes and clean their own quarters. It costs the United States just $1 cents a day to keep each German or $16.15 apiece per year. Of that $1 cents, 39 cents a day is the cost of food, about ten cents a meal.

The entire cost of maintaining the 2,300 Germans during the past year has been about $400,000. The camp itself cost $125,000 to build. Probably the whole bill will be submitted to Germany when the war is over, as no wonder the German government will render its bill for the upkeep of American prisoners of war.

The United States is caring for about 8,000 Germans in all camps in this country at present, though the number which the military authorities accumulate in France will be many times that before the war is over.

The prison problem is still in its infancy, but thus far the United States has given a splendid example of humane treatment and consideration which probably is not paralleled in any other belligerent country. Berlin papers please copy.
