A DISREPUTABLE PRACTICE.

At the present time there are four gentlemen in the race for the governorship of Texas; all democrats and from fair reports all well thought of and respected by their home people. They differ in policies and on vital questions of government, but aside from this deference all seem to be men of honor and reasonable respectability. Their home people vouch for this truth. And yet the Houston Post claiming to be democratic, and appointing itself a leader, and assuring its readers that it will support the ticket nominated by the democratic primaries, is spending its days and nights studying up contemptible invectives to hurl at at least two of these men, even after swearing its fealty to their party; and to their support in case they are either made the nominee for the high office of governor. The Post has already exhausted the catalogue of vituperation in its attacks on R. V. Davidson, and it has lately opened its batteries of slime on Cone Johnson. In its Sunday issue, along side of a goodly lay sermon, it refers to the Tyler man as a contestant with Judas Iscariot. And yet the Houston paper may have to support this man for governor. It is pledged to do so in case he is the nominee. There is no more bitter partisan paper in the country than the Post, and no paper that loses its head more quickly and more completely in the discussion of public questions and public men. With the Post it is either to worship a hero or scalp an enemy. Such journalistic practice is disreputable, and has a disgusting effect on all fair-minded men.

The Houston Post and Col. Jake Wolters have undertaken to save the personal liberty of Texas. In other words, they are going to keep the sa-

Doing Things Differently

If only the Criswells were content to live according to conventional rule existence doubtless would be much smoother for them. Also for others. It principally is others who rebel against the Criswells' cheerfully eccentric method of conducting themselves, their household and their affairs in general, because when things go wrong the Criswells are never bothered nor upset, having a childlike and joyous interest in whatever is unusual.

When a couple who have been married eight years get energetic enough to go to a ball the usual method of procedure after the dance is over is for the masculine member to yawn, mutter wearily that he has to get up at seven in the morning just the same and why the dickens doesn't the taxi get them home faster—while his wife says her head aches and somebody else's gown was far prettier than hers and oh, my, but she is sleepy!

Not the Criswells, however! When they reached their home shelter at two o'clock the other morning after dancing since nine they surveyed one another meditatively.

"I'm starved," said Mrs. Criswell. "So'm I," agreed Criswell.

With one accord they made for the kitchen. When the light was switched on and disclosed a disguised and startled mouse scurrying wildly for shelter Mrs. Criswell did not faint. Both she and her husband gurgled joyously. She grabbed a broom, Criswell seized the poker.

Probably there is some costume appropriate for the pastime of killing mice, but whatever it may be assuredly is not trailing lavender satin and a brand new dress suit. Still, the consciousness that they were inappropriately clothed had no deterring effect on the Criswells. A boiler factory in full action was the only thing that possibly could have made more noise than did they with broom, poker, overturned chairs and falling dishpans.

Finally, the intruder was dispatched and swept outdoors, the Criswells repaired personal damages and once more attempted a frugal lunch. They got it with some minor mishaps. Criswell knocked over a jar of preserves and his wife in pulling out the silver drawer pulled it too far, spilling a peck or so of table implements all over the hardwood floor. Still, they laughed so much that their troubles more than paid for themselves.

Just as Criswell pushed his chair back from the table a point of light glittered at him from the library. Diving toward it, he quickly emerged with a large toy engine in his hands.

"Elmer," said his wife, "I hate to appear inquisitive—but would you mind telling me if you have quite lost your senses? Have you still at this hour of the night such an insatiable thirst for amusement that you have to fall back on Tommy's toy engine? Isn't a dinner party, a dance, a mouse-killing bee—and a supper enough?"

"That's all right, Minnie," said Criswell, soothingly. "You know you're just as crazy over this fool thing as I am and it's never worked right since Tommy got it Christmas—and I don't know of a better time to fix it!"

The engine was an affair run by gas, so the Criswells with much labor got it attached to the gas fixture. Then on hands and knees they watched it plunge madly across the hardwood floor, chugging in a very business-like manner. It was while they were thus occupied that a noise interrupted them. Raising their heads from their absorbing occupation they saw enter what Mrs. Criswell afterward said was the biggest policeman she had ever in all her life beheld. Behind was a policeman still bigger, who in turn was trailed by the biggest policeman of all. They regarded the two persons in evening garb with suspicion.

"Whatchu doin' here?" demanded the biggest policeman.

Even the Criswells could see how foolish and inadequate it sounded to explain that they were running a child's toy engine at three o'clock in the morning. That was why they were meek when they had to explain the mouse-killing in the kitchen and the crash of silver in the dining-room and why they insisted piteously instead of wrathfully that they lived there and had a right to run toy engines in the middle of the night if they wanted to. It was not till Nora and Mary, the maids, who, roused from slumber by the weird noises downstairs, had telephoned the police station that there were burglars in the house and their employers were out, peered in timorously, that the Criswells finally cleared themselves of suspicion.

"We convinced those policemen that we weren't burglars," Mrs. Criswell says, "but nothing in a thousand years ever will convince them that we aren't lunatics, and dangerous ones, at that!"

"I don't care," says Criswell comfortably. "I think it was a very pleasant evening."

BOYS ARE IN EARNEST

In the Corn Club Movement—Report of the Meeting Held Saturday Afternoon in the City Hall.

The Anderson County Boys' Corn Club met at the city hall on Saturday afternoon, March 5. Mr. W. F. Proctor, special government agent for this part of Texas, addressed the boys on how to plant and cultivate their corn. He said the ground should be well broken and harrowed at least once—two or three times is better—and then fertilized well with lot manure, if sufficient can be had; if not, a high grade commercial fertilizer should be used, say two to four hundred pounds per acre, mixed well with the soil before planting. Two hundred pounds of cotton seed meal and one hundred pounds of acid phosphate, mixed well, give the best results on the average uplands. The planting seed should be the very best type of local corn grown in Anderson county. The rows on uplands should be from five to 7 feet apart, and left about 20 inches in the drill. The plat should be harrowed just as the corn is coming up, and then, if desired, the first cultivation after the harrowing should be some deeper, that it will stir the soil down, say three inches; and later it should be cultivated very shallow, with sweeps or spring tooth harrows or weedeers. Go over it every eight or ten days. When the corn is about three feet high it should have a side application of cotton seed meal of at least one hundred pounds per acre. He then told the boys of other boys who raised last year on one acre of corn more than their fathers did on ten times the land.

Then Mr. Sterne, on behalf of the Board of Trade, read the rules adopted by the Board to govern the distribution of prizes. He stated that the Board of Trade had selected for one prize a sold gold Waltham watch, on exhibition in the show window at the Kolstad Jewelry Store; a fine Winchester rifle, also on exhibition; and later a list of prizes will be published, including suits of clothes and various valuable articles contributed by merchants and business men. This part of the work is not yet completed, but they expect to have about twenty prizes. Mr. Bratton of the Bratton Drug company was present and stated that he would give $25.00 in gold. Mr. Geo. A. Wright said he would mix fertilizer for every boy according to whatever formula he desired and wait until the crop was made next fall, giving him the benefit of the lowest cash price without interest, and the boy who receives a prize shall have his fertilizer free. Mr. Proctor then added that the Bankers' Association of the state of Texas offers the boy who receives first prize at the Dallas Fair a choice of three prizes: First, a ten days' trip to Washington and New Entrance to the Most Famous Art Gallery of Paris.

At the height of the Paris flood grave fears were felt for the noted art gallery of the Louvre, which contains many famous works of art, including the Venus of Milo. Fortunately the flood fell before serious damage was done to the building or its contents.

York City, all expenses, Pullman and hotel bills paid; second, a year at the A. & M. College, including his uniform; third, $100 in gold. Prizes Nos. 2 and 3 to fall to the next boy after the first one has made his choice. The Dallas Fair Association has offered the Boys' Corn Clubs of the state $1,080 in money, distributed in $50, $25 and $10 state sweepstakes, district sweepstakes and individual Funderburk, then read the proposed districts.

The secretary, Mr. Tom Funderburk, then read the proposed constitution and by-laws submitted by the committee, and after a little discussion and a few changes it was adopted.

Prof. Buck and Mr. Walter Melnnis, local government agent, will endeavor this week to visit every school district in the county and enroll the names of a great many boys in auxiliary corn clubs. The following names were added Saturday: Arthur Bascom, R. R. 2; Wade Butler, H. S. Moddox, R. R. 7; Tommie Crisp, R. R. 8; Marvin Kennedy, R. R. 8; Raymond Freeck, Palestine.

The next meeting will be duly announced and will take place after midsummer, when the corn is matured—perhaps in August. Mr. Proctor will come back and bring with him Mr. Green, a noted judge of good corn, and teach the contestants how to select their best corn and prepare it for exhibition. This is an important point and one not to be neglected, that Anderson county may loom up big at the State Fair.
