their religion as scrupulously as does any Christian sect; they take care of their poor and needy without asking public alms; and if they are in a measure segregated, it is because racial and religious prejudices drives them to it. Socially, they foregather among themselves and get the best there is out of life. They unite pride with knowledge; they glory in their history; they have infinite faith in their traditions; they practice their creed.

If God were worshipped in every church as devoutly as He is in the synagogue; if Christian rites were always as earnest and sincere as are those of the temple; if there were less sneering at Hebrews and larger profit by their suggestions, the community would gain, not lose.—Dayton (Ohio) Journal.
