Thy Mother.

Lead thy mother tenderly Down life's steep descent. Once her arms are round thy neck, Now she leans on thine.

When thy mother's face Shows those deep lines of care; Think—it is her lot for thee Left that record there.

Never forget her tireless watch Kept by day and night; Taking from her own repose, From her eyes the light.

Which will her faithful heart, Which will through the weary years Echoed with its sympathy, All thy smiles and tears.

Thank God for thy mother's love; Guard the precious hour; For the bitter, parting hour Cometh all too soon.

When thy grave-friend tenderness Loses power to save, Earth will hold her dearer spot Than thy mother's grave.

STATUE OF LIBERTY. THE GODDESSES' VISITORS NOT SO NUMEROUS AS THEY WERE.

Bartholdi's Work Falling More and More into a Conventional Harbor Landmark—Visitors from the Country—A Commanding Outlook—Statuettes.

Few big undertakings are a whole year's wonder, and it is only natural that the Statue of Liberty should be falling more and more into a conventional harbor landmark.

Things on the island look much as they did the day after the unveiling. The same rough wooden stairs lead up from the pier to the outer ramparts.

Most of the visitors to Bartholdi's Island nowadays are people from the country stopping over at New York or two in New York. What they don't know about the harbor from the guide books is scarcely worth knowing.

FROM THE COUNTRY. Most of the visitors to Bartholdi's Island nowadays are people from the country stopping over at New York or two in New York.

A COMMANDING OUTLOOK. No visit to the island is complete without a look through the North Bolo from the middle of which the statue rises.

When Dumma, the younger, once asked his father how to write a play, the older answered: "It is very simple; the best or clear, the last and shortest and interest wherever."
