Panama Canal Revenues

THE bonds for the payment of the cost of the Panama canal were issued to become due in fifty years. The tolls on the canal should annually be adjusted so as to be just sufficient to meet expenses and repairs, pay the interest and supply a sinking fund which will meet the bonds when due. Of course, the above means when the nations and with them the world's commerce are restored to a normal condition, and the canal is perfected—the slides in the big cut finally subdued and the canal properly fortified.

What we mean is that the United States should never hold the canal as a source of revenue, as the Suez canal is held. The Suez canal is owned by an incorporated company, and its shares are dealt in. The Panama canal is a monument to our nation, built for the benefit of the world's commerce.

At Last

THE summer is broken at last. It was postponed twenty days this year, and they were somewhat warm for this latitude. Eighty-seven days without a shower somewhat intensified the unpleasantness, but they were good for the farmers in which to harvest their grain. No grain growing in the shock to bother them this year. Henceforth until after Thanksgiving day, if the year is normal we shall, with now and then a day's storm, have soft and pleasant days and cool nights. There may be a conference rain of two or three days, it will be necessary to remind old saints how it was before they had any tabernacle, assembly hall or temple. However, it is reasonable to believe that the declining summer may merge into a long autumn without very much more occasion to growl at the weather.

The School Children

THERE has been a great hush in many portions of this city during the past week between the hours of 8:30 a. m. and 4 p. m. because the inexorable schools have absorbed the youngsters that during the long vacation have divided honors with the young roosters who have been in daily and nightly practice with their new voices and filling the streets with their clamor.

In the morning they—the children, not the roosters—go singly and in droves with swinging baskets and endless chatter, to school, their dogs accompany them. The dogs return one by one and seem in a brown study on the problem of why they are excluded from the school rooms; they return—the children, not the dogs—in the afternoon, the events of the day are their theme and many and wise are the arguments pro and con, as to the wisdom of some of the proceedings. Embryo lawyers present the arguments and embryo doctors prescribe the remedies, and different from the grown-ups, what they say fills the streets with music.

And it can be noticed that certain of the boys and certain of the girls walk in pairs and it is easy to believe that a good many of them will when they are older agree to take the long walk which only ends at the grave or in the divorce courts.

There were millions of just such children seen every day, ten and fifteen years ago going and coming from the schools of Great Britain and on the continent, the lads and lassies were walking side by side and the sun was not so bright as were their hopes. Where are they now? The boys are dead or in the trenches, the girls, all their bright robes put away, all their songs stilled, are walking alone and wondering if the suffering in the field is as great as to remain at home.

So the swift journey between the cradle and the grave goes on. May our people be spared from the sorrows that are making the old world one vast house of mourning and filling the air with funeral plumes and tolling bells.
