

SAUNTERINGS

There isn't a theatre in America where such an orchestra may be heard as that which is now at the American under the direction of the eminent organist, Professor J. J. McClellan, with twenty-two musicians nearly all of whom are more or less distinguished in their profession. With the added concert features each week contributed by the most prominent instrumentalists and singers in the city Salt Lake may boast of a moving picture house in a class by itself. That cultured people of the city are appreciating the music in combination with play pictures of the first class and the leading feature pictures of the country, is attested by the personnel of the attendance at the American daily and nightly, and it is getting to be quite the thing to make up parties to attend the theatre between dinner time and that hour later in the evening when the dancing begins.

It was only a night or two ago, that a famous eastern critic dropped into the American with his friends, and before he was there ten minutes said: "Why, we've got nothing like this in New York," and he made it a point to go every night during his stay in the city.

At the request of no less than thirteen tall bankers scattered over an area from South Temple to Fourth South, we wish to announce that none of the thirteen was intended in a recent yarn which appeared in these columns. In the meantime we are looking into individual cases to see why they are so solicitous that a correction be made, and will probably have some interesting news at a later date.

According to the Los Angeles Graphic there has been an unusual increase in the membership of the "I-knew-him-when" club since Charles Van Loan achieved fame and fortune through his clever short stories of the baseball field, the prize ring and the movie studio. The latest tale about him runs as follows: Charley, with his wife and two friends, was visiting one of the nearby seaside resorts and halted before a concession featuring a peripatetic artist, one of those mortals who have only to daub their brushes in a careless way across the canvas to produce stupendous mountains, startling lake scenes or dazzling sunsets. The Van Loan party was forced to linger by the ceaseless comment the artist directed at them as he evolved a brilliant orange-red sunset in a sea of molten copper. "Now here you have a masterpiece, worth $50 in any art store in the country," said the brush wielder. "You can buy a chance at it for ten cents." Van Loan threw a dime on the counter. The coupon he drew was declared upon examination by the painter to be good for any picture on display. Take your choice and I will deliver it," announced its creator, grandiloquently. "Well, friend," said Van Loan, with a drawl, "just take that Spanish omelet you have there and send it out to the Institute for the Blind, with my compliments."
