

cashiers. Defaulters and embezzlers will go to prison or commit suicide and then there will be a renewed agitation throughout the country for the regulation of Wall street by some manner of federal restraint.

But the repentant brokers have not suffered. They are probably reaping more profit from limited dealings on forty per cent commission than on unlimited dealings at twenty per cent. In five days last week on the New York stock exchange the total transactions exceeded 7,000,000 shares, which gave the brokers $1,750,000 in commissions. Even should the steps taken to restrain speculation reduce by one-half the total transactions in war specialties—which is out of the question—the brokers still would make just as much profit as formerly if they should double their commissions. The chances are that their profits will be increased.

When a write on a paper of the standing of the Tribune does not know enough regarding current happenings and business transactions to distinguish between commissions on stock sales and margins required in dealings in the same, no wonder the layman is often misguided by following such highly intellectual efforts. The gem of the article is the part of the sentence which reads: "They are probably reaping more profit from limited dealings on forty per cent commission, than on unlimited dealings at twenty per cent." Can you beat it?

If it costs a man and six colored gentlemen associated with him in the hectic enterprise of providing libations for the thirsty after midnight, $700 to get away when arrested on a charge of selling liquor after closing hours, and he is allowed to depart on his own recognizance when arrested for accidentally killing a man with his automobile, what would be the proportion of punishment if convicted on either charge? Probably seven hundred years for serving a drink and a kiss on the forehead for the killing. Have you any ideas on the subject, Mr. Wille?

The results of the straw vote at the American theatre for the candidates for mayor, commissioners and auditor preceding the primary election compared with the real returns showed that the order of the vote was exactly the same, proportionately, as the final result. This has caused considerable comment and has lent additional interest to the straw vote for the qualifying candidates which will be begun by the American people on Sunday.
