The one dollar mark on the bill was blotted white and with green ink changed to ten dollars. Layton still awaits trial, having never had an opportunity to put his get-rich-quick scheme in operation.

Two miners up in Butte, John McManus and Thomas Shinner, in October last saw a way of making money easily by passing counterfeit one dollar silver pieces. Callaghan was soon on their trail and they fell as a great many counterfeiters do by drinking too many drinks in a saloon and paying for them with spurious coin.

The government is not always unrelenting. Its justice is sometimes tempered with mercy even toward would-be counterfeiters. If Callaghan would he could tell you the story of a very respected gray-haired jeweler who has been in Zion these seventeen years past, and has a delightful wife and grown up children; a man whose credit now is unimpeachable in the community. He could tell you how this man experimented with a twenty dollar gold piece, cut it in half and extracted the gold from the inside, leaving only a shell and filled this with alloy and how one night he slunk into a saloon near his place of business and got it changed into bills. Probably he would have tried the game again, but the saloon keeper soon discovered the counterfeit and knew exactly who passed the coin, because he was taken very much by surprise when his neighbor came in his saloon, never having heard of the man ever entering a saloon before. Callaghan was notified and the man was visited. At first he denied and then he confessed and because it was his first offense and because of his long life of respectability the charge was not pressed.

Mrs. Youngwedd (a doctor's daughter)—Did papa say he would do anything for me?

Youngwedd—Yes; he said he would operate upon me at any time free of charge.—Pickings.

The woman of the house reached the conclusion that the attachment of the policeman for her cook must be investigated, lest it prove disastrous to domestic discipline. "Do you think he means business, Bridget?" she asked. "I think he does, mum," said Bridget. "He's begun to complain about my cookin', mum."—London Opinion.

British Foreman Compositor—Three more of my men have enlisted this morning.

Editor—Ah! A wave of patriotism, I suppose?

Foreman Compositor—Well! Perhaps that's the way to put it, but they say they would rather be shot than set any more of your copy!—Passing Show.
