POOR SID

THE news of the death of Sidney K. Hooper comes as a personal bereavement to thousands. So brave a fight he made against the fever that finally consumed him, that his friends nursed the hope that he would eventually conquer it. But it was not to be. From more than one defeat he called together his scattered forces and finally triumphed, but the inevitable was against him in his last struggle. Poor Sid!

Proud and sensitive and brave always, only those who knew him intimately knew his deeper, truer self. Proud he was, but it was honest pride—pride in the name he bore, pride in the friends that were his, and in his own high purposes, but there was not a speck of false pride in his composition. When the exuberance of his youth had passed, he turned his feet to the path which Duty marked out for him, and from that path he has never for one moment deviated. With hand and brain he took up the work before him and bent all his faculties to the work, but all the time his generous manhood shone out in full evidence, and every day not only his work, but the sagacity behind it, grew more and more pronounced. All the time, too, his generous nature was alert, and he was never too busy to turn aside to perform some generous act, and no one near him was ever permitted for one moment to forget that he was a born, self-respectful gentleman.

Today the memory of his genial, cheerful ways, his courtly but always kindly courtesies, his unpretentious but sincere manhood, come back in thought and the sorrow for him is most profound.

All sympathy goes out to the stricken wife, to the baby that does not know its infinite loss, to the sisters that have worshipped their brother all their lives, and today are desolate.

To the brave spirit that has fled through our tears we send all hallos and farewells, and with them the earnest hope that those who are left, who in life were dear to him, may be comforted, and that everlasting peace has come to the tried soul that is fled.
