THE MARKET AND THE MINES

Several persons who were once owners of Iron Blossom stock are no longer in that class. And several persons are wondering how and when and where the separation from their stock occurred. It was all so sudden! So unexpected! So violent! All accounts agree that Friday was the day of the catastrophe, but there are differences as to the manner of its happening. It is known that on the morning of that Friday, Iron Blossom shares were $2.50 and better, with no sign on the horizon of a squall, but "when the sun set, ah, where were they?" In the language of a local literary light, "where had they went to?" They were quoted at $2.30! One version of the disaster is that a number of traders had purchased large blocks of Iron Blossom on thin margins—were unable to take the stock up—brokers tired carrying them—brokers importunate—traders indifferent—price drops quickly—kersplash!—margins wiped out—traders sold out—stock goes up again to $2.40. Moral: One ace up the sleeve is worth a full hand in the deck.

The other version of the affair is that a large number of buyers' options expired on Friday, but the buyers, neglecting to come through with the purchase money, left the stock in the hands of their brokers. To protect themselves the brokers were obliged to throw many shares on the market. The oversupply broke the price and the slump was not arrested until the news of the great slaughter sale spread abroad and brought enough eager bargain-hunters to the counter to bid the share back to its normal figure. The broker chaps like this fairy story better than the other one. Some of the traders who were put asunder from their Iron Blossom in such a cavalier manner, claim that they were jobbed. The brokers deny it. And there you are! Nevertheless, the net result of the Iron Blossom slump will be to discourage the practice of buying more stock than you can pay for.

The bear element on 'change took notes on the ease with which Iron Blossom had been let down and have since made a target of the share. This bear campaign accounts for most of the derogatory rumors which have gained currency, such as the story that the new ore body is getting thinner and poorer as it goes south through the property. There is no confirmation of this story and, even if it were true, the ore shoot already exposed is so big and so rich that the prevailing price of the stock is fully justified. The Iron Blossom's first cash dividend, due on Saturday, is almost sure to raise the share to a higher level on 'change.

Columbus Con.'s rapid advance to $3 a share this week drew the attention of the bear operators to that issue and gave rise to the charge that the stock was being manipulated. A short interest in Columbus is growing up and the weaknesses of its position, if any there be, will be shouted from the housetops before many days. Nevertheless, $3 does not seem an exorbitant price for the stock.

With the complete installation of new hoisting works at the Pioche King property in Pioche, another company of Salt Lakers is ready to go ahead with the development of another property in the rejuvenated camp. The King is now thoroughly equipped, and according to the president, John A. Kerby, the mine will soon be producing a large tonnage. For the present, the principal work will be confined to sinking a shaft, the facilities now being such that there will be nothing to hinder the work. The Pioche King adjoins the ground of the Prince Consolidated, and the prospect for the opening of a splendid property is very promising.
