CASSE-COU.

A New Translation From the French of Du Boisgobey.

CHAPTER XXX.

ON THE RIGHT TRACK.

"Yes; but if you wish to have information, it is at the custom house that you must ask for it, and here we are now."

Three minutes after this conversation the cab drove up to the grating, and Paul began to question the custom house men on duty.

At the first words which he uttered he found that he was listened to with the utmost attention.

The men made him tell them over several times how Catabrenner and Cassonade were dressed, and while he was talking they gave one another strange looks.

At last one of them begged him to come down and speak to the principal officer at the post.

Somewhat surprised at this request, Paul got down and went toward the station, followed by Morillon, who had left his mare to the care of the men on guard.

When he found himself in the presence of the superintendent the young man opened the narration of his anxieties as the chevalier and his attendant.

The administrator had interrupted the report which he had been making at the desk when he came in.

"Sir," said he, gravely, when Paul had ceased to speak, "I came here for the express purpose of investigating the strange events which have taken place to-day at Cassilas' house."

"Strange events!" repeated the young man with terror, "have my friends been the victims of violence? Have they fallen into any trap?"

"I do not know, but I can tell you that the clerk who followed the men whom you call your friends has not reappeared."

"This is very strange!"

"And I have strong reasons for believing that this clerk has paid dear for the zeal which he displayed in watching the accomplices of the man named Birolas."

"What accomplices do you allude to," demanded Paul, anxiously.

"The two men whom you have come to inquire about," replied the superintendent, coldly.

"That is an accusation which I indignantly deny in their name!"

"Your testimony seems to me to be insufficient, and you must admit yourself that the whole matter ought to be investigated before you can be looked upon as responsible for them. The man named Coulas is a smuggler of the worst description, quite capable of more serious crimes than smuggling; now, your friends know him, and chose the very spot on which we intended to arrest him to make him a visit. We have good reason to think from all this that they came to warn him."

"But this is infamous!"

"No accusations, if you please. Content yourself to explaining to me the real purpose of their coming to this suspicious place."

Paul's embarrassment was evident.

He did not believe himself to be at liberty to tell the first person who came along about Cambremer's private affairs, and he tried to get out of the difficulty by making an evasive answer.

"It was for a very simple reason: they came to buy coal."

"Indeed!" said the officer; "they came to buy coal at a place where there has been no coal sold for six months."

The young man did not reply.

"Do you know, sir, that an individual of your age and about your size has been reported as having passed the Barriere Saint Jacques, running as fast as he could? He was seen to get into a yellow cab—quite similar to the one that is waiting for you at the gate."

The officer dwelt intentionally upon his last words.

"A yellow cab! That is my cab, then!" exclaimed Morillon, who had listened to the interrogation without saying a word. "You confess it, then?"

"Certainly, and I can tell you, besides, that the individual in question was a woman disguised as a man, who made me take her as fast as I could to the Boulevard Poissonniere. I think, now that I call it to mind, that she had been up to some mischief or other at Biroulas' house."

"That is very unlikely, what you say now," said the officer, looking the driver full in the face.

When he heard the information given by Morillon, Paul listened attentively.

"What kind of a woman was she?" he asked, anxiously.

"Tall, thin and dark, with black eyes and a haughty look."

"It is she!" exclaimed Vernier unguardedly, for he had recognized the description of his evil genius from Frascati's rooms.

"Good! it seems that you know who it is."

This remark, made in a dry tone, brought him back to the realities of the situation.

He attempted to explain, with much hesitation, his relations with the doubtful individual alluded to by Morillon; but he perceived that his listener took pleasure in trying to make him commit himself.

A clerk came in at this inconvenient moment to interrupt him. He had with him a cap belonging to the excise-man who had disappeared; this convincing proof having been found under the stairs of the house of Biroulas. It was, in fact, the result of several hours of careful search.
