VOL. I--NO. 12.

RICHMOND, VA., APRIL 17, 1865.

FEELING OF THE PEOPLE OF THE NORTH TOWARD THE SOUTH.

One of the main arguments used by the leaders during the existence of the late rebellion, to keep alive the passions of those whom they had duped into an advocacy of their pernicious heresies, was the assertion, which was constantly reiterated on the stump, in the newspapers, from the pulpit, in public and private, everywhere in fact, that the people of the North in the war for the Union, were actuated by the most deadly hatred towards the people of the South; that they did not desire to restore the Union, but simply wreak on them a long-boasted vengeance; that they would rather cut a throat, or burn a house, than to save life or stop the flames. These misrepresentations of the motives of those who were putting their lives in peril to save the country from anarchy had their effect in making the people of Dixie not only willing to acquiesce in the tyranny established by Jeff. Davis, but aid it in every way. How atrociously false and basely unjust were these aspersions, will be known ere long. Suffice it now to quote, in refutation of them, some words uttered by the most prominent Republican Journal in Northern New York. On the receipt of the news of the surrender of Gen. Lee and his army, that journal, instead of saying "hang all of them," as it would have done had it only been a true vengeance, spoke thus:

General Lee surrendered his whole army, with all its artillery, baggage train, munitions of war, small arms, etc., and Grant, with a proper spirit of respect for brave soldiers, treats the officers and men with due courtesy, and gives them liberty on their parole of honor.

In the surrender of an army which, during four years, has set at defiance the whole power of the mightiest military nation on earth, we have the grandest tribute ever yet paid to the unconquerable strength and matchless prestige of the republic. It is a tribute, also, to the wonderful genius and heroic perseverance of Ulysses S. Grant, who has brought about the termination of this gigantic war.

We treat this as virtually ending the struggle, because it is not conceivable that any of the Confederate Generals will feel inclined to protract the war and waste more rivers of blood after their commander in chief, whose tremendous resistance in Virginia has been the main stay of the rebellion, has abandoned all hope, and thrown himself and his army upon the generosity of the victorious Grant.

If ever a beaten and surrendered army, fighting in a bad cause, earned for itself the respect of those against whose banner it had been arrayed, it surely is the Confederate army just given up by Gen. Lee into the hands of the victorious Grant.

The men of that army on many an ensanguined field—on many a perilous march—on many a day of suffering and hardship—have proved themselves soldiers worthy of the proud American race. It must ever be a source of regret that such an army should have been found fighting against the flag under which the race had been rendered immortal. And now, at the close of the mighty struggle, when this terrible army, which has been for four years the very bulwark of the rebellion, has ended the reign of sorrow and blood by bringing us peace as it once brought us war, we feel that we should be cheerful and narrow-minded indeed could we refuse this parting tribute to the soldiers of the great Confederate army of Northern Virginia. They fought well so long as there was a hope of success for their cause; and in their discipline, their courage, their steadiness, their perseverance and endurance, they exalted the American name in the eyes of all the world not less than did our own gallant veterans. The men who have fought out such a conflict can afford to close it without heartburnings or hatred. They have met in deadly strife, and know as a matter of course to be men worthy of the American race.

We speak now of the soldiers of the rebel armies. Of the political chiefs who have driven them on, ever fierce, we do not now care to speak. We fought for liberty and peace, and having secured them both, we shall deal with becoming magnanimity with the soldiers of the conquered armies. They would have protracted the struggle, but have chosen to submit to inevitable fate, and by so doing they have secured the return of peace to their desolated homes, and put an end to useless bloodshed. For so much they deserve our consideration, and we should be harsh and unfeeling did we not acknowledge this much. They have struggled for a great end, and they have not been without great victories. They have seen times when their object seemed almost certain. How fearful, then, must be their present disappointment, chagrin and humiliation.

These remarks are from the Albany Evening Journal, and are certainly anything but vindictive. Could handsomer things be said of men who have been doing their best for four years to subvert the Government. We believe the people of the North are disposed to forgive all those who "bring forth fruits meet for repentance." If the leaders are hung or otherwise used up, they cannot complain. Hardly anybody will regret it, yet we repeat that our people are forgiving in their disposition, and are not bloodthirsty.—Alex. State Journal.

Col. Gamble, commanding the Union forces at Fairfax Station, has received a message from Mosby, in which the Rebel chief states that he does not care a d— about the surrender of Lee, and that he is determined to fight as long as he has a man left. He may fight his way to the gallows.

The funeral services of the late Brig. Gen. Winthrop were attended on Wednesday at Trinity Church, New York, in presence of an immense congregation. Three militia regiments and one of the regular army acted as escort.
