PEACE TREATY IS SIGNED.

DOCUMENT WAS EXECUTED AT PORTSMOUTH TUESDAY.

Formal End of the Russo-Japanese War--Simple Ceremony Attended Affixing of Signatures--Envoys of Two Nations Clasp Hands-- Treaty Had Been Prepared in Advance--Its Main Features--Sovereigns Congratulate Roosevelt.

The "Treaty of Portsmouth" was signed Tuesday afternoon in the conference room of the store building at the navy yard. The firing of a national salute gave the public notice, and bells were rung in Portsmouth and neighboring towns.
The ceremony of signing was simple, yet impressive. Only a few invited Americans were present. Duplicate copies of the treaties had been prepared, a French copy for the Russians and an English copy for the Japanese. The four envoys affixed their names in order to joined hands in silence across the table.
Not a word had been spoken thus far.
Finally Rosen addressed a short expression of amity to the Japanese envoys, to which Komura replied in kind. Both dwelt on the momentous nature of the event and bespoke lasting good will between the peoples. Witte asked for a private conference with the Japanese envoys, and the four retired for about ten minutes. What transpired between them is a close secret.
Afterward, the protocol was signed, which is an abstract of all that was said and done during the negotiations. Following the signature luncheon, the envoys then shook hands and separated. The Russians went immediately to Christ Episcopal church, where a service of the Russian orthodox church was held by celebrants from New York. M. Witte was received with a tremendous cheer by the people outside. The envoys will pass a few days in sightseeing, then return to their respective countries.
The substance of the treaty is about as outlined heretofore. It re-establishes peace and friendship between the governments and peoples; Japan secures pre-ponderant interest in Korea, but Russia has the same rights there as other countries; Manchuria is to be evacuated by Russians and Japanese at the same time; Japan gets the lease held by Russia of Port Arthur and Dalny; regulates the division of the Manchurian railway line between the Japanese and the Russians; provides for the Japanese and the Russians to share equally in the operation of this railroad between them; divides Sakhalin island so that Japan gets part south of the 50th parallel, neither nation to fortify its part and Japan engaging not to fortify La Perouse straits south of the island; renews commercial treaties existing before the war, with a few changes; Japan secures fishing rights along Siberian coast; each nation to pay the other the real cost of keeping its war prisoners; sovereigns of nations to ratify the treaty within 60 days.
No serious difficulty was experienced in drafting the treaty, which was done by Prof. Martens, the Russian, and Mr. Denison, the American legal adviser of the Japanese.

The czar of Russia and the mikado of Japan have both called their warm congratulations to President Roosevelt for the part he took in bringing about the peace agreement. An armistice has been signed which will prevent further fighting, until the sovereigns ratify the treaty.

Would-Be-Bouncer Bounced.

President Roosevelt has demanded the resignation of Public Printer Palmer, head of the government printing office. It has been known that the president would not reappoint Palmer on account of scandals connected with the placing of Lanston machines in the office, as revealed by the Keep investigating commission. There has been friction between Palmer and some of his subordinates, one of whom, Foreman Oscar J. Ricketts, is a candidate to succeed him. Palmer undertook to discharge Ricketts and another foreman named Hay on the charge of insubordination. They claimed to hold their places under civil service rules, and denied the power of Palmer to drop them without cause, which they claimed he in reality lacked. They appealed to the president, who will drop Palmer instead.
