WRIGHT BROTHERS' AIRSHIP
GREW FROM CHILDHOOD TOY

DAYTON, Ohio, Sept. 21—They were boys, but they had been dreaming of a flying machine from the time they were able to breathe. In those days when their playmates were building model boats and trucks and men, they were building flying machines that were bigger than anything they had ever seen.

They were Orville and Wilbur Wright, and they grew up to build one. It is a story that should be read to every child in the world.

Aeroplanes and their Inventors

The Wright brothers, who built and flew the first aeroplane, were born in 1867 and 1871, respectively, in Dayton, Ohio. They were not attended at school and had to teach themselves almost all the things they knew.

Their father was a teacher who taught them to read and to write. Their mother taught them the alphabet. They read out of the Bible and other books. They learned to draw and to paint. They learned to do all sorts of work.

They were very curious boys and they wanted to know everything. They wanted to know how things worked.
They wanted to know how things were made.

They were very clever boys and they were never bored. They were never sad. They were never tired. They were never bored.

They were never bored.
