Deceived by the Shadows

By L. Frank Baum

The discovery was made in a cave in the mountains of Arizona. The cave was a natural one, with walls of solid rock, and was large enough for a man to stand upright in the center. In the center of the cave was a great pile of bones, some of which were human, and others were from small animals. The bones were scattered about in no particular order, and it was evident that the cave had been utilized for a long time by some primitive race of people. The bones were studied by the archaeologists, who found that they belonged to a people who had lived in this region at least ten thousand years ago.

Plain and Tucked Hair

by George Ade

"Yes, ma'am, my hair is plain and tucked," said the man to the hairdresser. "I don't want no curls, no waves, no pomades, no hair dressings. Just plain and tucked is what I want." The hairdresser looked at the man, and then he smiled and said, "Well, sir, I'll just make your hair the way you want it." And he did.

The Suits That the Maker Must Forget

by O. Henry

Several years before, a man had bought a suit of clothes at a reputable store. He had worn them for a year, and then they had been returned to the store, together with a receipt. The store had paid for them, and the man had been satisfied. The man had been satisfied with the suit, and had worn it for a year. The suit was in good condition, and the man had been satisfied with it. The store had paid for the suit, and the man had been satisfied with it.

Dye to Deft Earthquakes

by William J. Locke

In order to protect their houses from the effects of earthquakes, the inhabitants of the town of Barlow, Oregon, have taken measures to prevent them from being damaged. They have built strong walls around their buildings, and have dug deep trenches around them. In case of an earthquake, the walls will hold the buildings in place, and the trenches will act as shock absorbers.
