In Fight Against Cannon
WASHINGTON, March 19—The legal campaign to destroy the Cannon Act in Congress was stepped up today. At 8:30 a.m., Representative James Pitts, D-Harvard, announced that a group of his colleagues had decided to confide a group of his colleagues had decided to confide in Representative Thaddeus Stevens, D-Pennsylvania, the plan to move to withdraw the bill immediately. This move was strongly opposed by Representative John F. Smith, D-Maine, who declared that he would do anything to prevent the passage of the bill.

The Committee on Ways and Means, which was considering the bill, was called to order at 10 a.m. and the proceedings were adjourned until 3 p.m. The bill was then referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, which was expected to report back on its findings by the end of the month.

ISSUES
The bill, introduced by Representative Cannon, is designed to provide for the abolition of the public schools and the establishment of a system of religious education. It is opposed by a large number of representatives, who believe that the bill would be detrimental to the interests of the country.

The bill has already passed the House of Representatives, but has not yet been considered by the Senate. It is expected to be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, which is expected to report back on its findings by the end of the month.

A meeting of the Committee on Education and Labor is scheduled for 3 p.m. today. It is expected to be attended by members of both parties, and is expected to be a lively discussion.

The bill is expected to be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, which is expected to report back on its findings by the end of the month.
