FOR BACKACHE, HEADACHE AND BLINDNESS

Bridesmaid and Bride In an Hour.

A spirited daughter of a well-known southern family that has figured socially for many generations, a miss of sixteen, has just set society agog before she has been allowed by a watchful mother even to make her formal bow to it. A few weeks ago she returned from a European school to be bridesmaid at her sister's wedding, at which this demure school girl figured in a most unusual manner.

As one of the bride's attendants, she was permitted to be present at some of the social events preliminary to the wedding and in a very little sister fashion made the acquaintance of the groom's ushers and friends.
The nearer came the wedding day, the more gay and joyous grew the little school girl. Then came the wedding rehearsal and finally the wedding itself, an event of widespread social interest. After the ceremony in the oak drawing rooms of the charming southern home there were feasting and dancing on the wide verandas and the lawn.

The bride was about to don her travelling dress, the groom's car was standing in the porte-cochere ready for the run to the station, when suddenly the demure little sister bridesmaid was missed. Search high and low could not find her. Servants were sent over the house and the garden in vain. No one seemed to notice that some one else was missing, too. The wedding party was forming itself into a search party.

when down the drive came the honk of a motor and up to the door spun a touring car with none other than the demure sixteen-year-old and the groom's younger brother. The two dashed upstairs, paused at the top and looked back.

"You'll need more rice," called the young man.
"Here's a chance for another bride!" cried the shy little sister, as she threw her bouquet of pink roses among the astonished assemblage.
"We've been married at the person's!"
Fitting, incidentally, to the unusual part she played as bridesmaid and bride in one short hour is the exquisite frock in which this demure miss is pictured. It is made after a suggestion she brought home from abroad and embodies all the crispness that is a delightful part of this June's bridesmaid's frocks. All in ethereal blue silk net, it covers a blue taffeta underdress corded to flare at the hem. The simple corset is bound by a soft girlish silk sash, held with a spray of pink apple-blossoms. The gathered skirt, flounced sewed to flounce, widens fly to the hem, which emphasizes the abbreviation now evident in all smart frocks, whether brides', bridesmaid's or everyday folk's. The hat combines blue net and apple blossoms.

So there were two bridal couples, instead of one, to leave for the train that afternoon, and society in half a dozen cities is still gossiping about the shy little school girl bridesmaid, who so suddenly bloomed into a bride.

manner in which the militia looked on the crowd as bottles and bricks were hurled at them and stated that they showed that they were well-trained men not to have opened fire on their assailants.
