Albert Payson, of Payette, Idaho, is touring the valley in quest of a new home place. He was attracted here by reports of the excellence of our climate and the productivity of our soil, but his investigation so far has convinced him that, without irrigation, a farmer in this valley is subjected too severely to chance. He comes from an irrigated district and knows the value of water applied when it is needed by growing crops.

Try a King Spitz cigar and encourage home industry.

It is said by those who are in position to know that more talk of diversified farming is heard in this valley this season than ever before. The tendency to engage in diversified farming should always be accompanied by knowledge of the fact that diversified productions of the farm, more than any other excitation, absolutely require irrigation. In arid and semi-arid regions it is too generally a failure without a convenient and abundant supply of water for artificial irrigation to be less than a hazardous undertaking. So, it may be assumed that there is a more widespread determination in this valley to encourage the irrigation projects now under consideration than ever before. The reports of preliminary surveys will soon be ready for submission to the farmers and on them they may form a definite idea as to what it will be necessary to do to get the water.

Raymond Larkin, of Ellensburg, Wash., who stopped to see Medford and vicinity on his return from the Panama exposition, has concluded to extend his stay here and at other points in the valley, pending the decision of the farmers on the sugar factory project. He is greatly pleased with the valley and expresses surprise at the general appearance of thrift hereabouts, notwithstanding the disastrous effect of the drought this year and last. Mr. Larkin is an irrigationist, also, having come from a region that would be practically a desert without it. He clearly sees the indubitable need of irrigation here.

Those raised on irrigated land yielded 44 tons to the acre, while those on non-irrigated soil produced 19 tons.
