SALT FOR LIVE STOCK.

Stimulates the Appetite and Helps Build Up Tissue.

Some recent experiments tried in France confirmed the idea that stock having a regular supply of salt were more thrifty and made better use of the feed they ate than those deprived of salt for a considerable time. A supply of salt should be kept in every pasture field and be accessible to the animals at all times. The common custom of salting stock once a week is a very poor way to supply the needs of the stock. The strongest ones will get enough possibly, but the weaker ones—and these are the ones that need it most—will be kept back and never get a full supply.

One of the best ways to supply live stock with salt is to buy rock salt and place slabs of it in places convenient for the stock to get at it. The weather has but little effect on it, and stock can get all they need by simply sucking the salt slab. To feed it to horses put a piece in the feed box where they can get it at any time. This does not interfere with feeding the horses, and at the same time a little of the salt gets on all the grain given them. Even pigs will lick a block of rock salt, although a good many people never think of salting the pigs.

Why salt should be regularly supplied to stock is thus put by a famous English authority: Because in the blood of animals there are six or seven times more sodium than potassium and the composition of the blood is constant. To keep animals in good health a definite amount of common salt must be assimilated. The excess of potassium salts in vegetable foods causes by chemical exchange an abnormal loss of common salt.

This is proved by the fact that the craving of an animal for common salt is most noticeable when the food contains a large proportion of potassium salts, such as wheat, barley, oats, potatoes, beans and peas. The addition of salt to animal food increases the appetite, promotes the repair of tissue by its searching diffusion through the body and stimulates the rapid using up of its waste products. Bousin-gault's experiments showed that salt increases muscular vigor and activity and improves the general appearance and condition.

A salt box to leave out in the yard may be easily made by hinging the front of the box so it will swing in. The animals soon learn to push the door in when they want a lick of salt. This box may be made any size, from a foot wide up to the size of a large packing box. The larger sizes are better for horned cattle.

Care of the Horse.
When the mud is deep it always pays to keep horses, young or old, on dry footing, says the Breeder's Gazette. To allow colts and older animals to travel around through cornstalk fields ankle deep in soft black oozy mud is sure sooner or later to set up some irritation of the skin of the legs which may prove exceedingly hard to cure and which will surely retard growth. Similarly the sleeping quarters of horses in damp winter weather should always be kept scrupulously dry and clean. It is not only a shame, but a money loser as well, to force horses to stand in wet manure during the night. No amount of food will compensate for the injury caused by the enforced discomfort. It is true that when the land is dry or hard frozen young horses can obtain a lot of feed in a cornstalk field, but it should always be remembered that weather beaten stalks are not the sort of stuff on which market topping horses are reared. More especially is this stopping around in the mud hard on yearlings and weanlings. These, above all, should have dry quarters in which to live in peace and comfort. This is not to say that the practice of letting horses wallow around in the mud is a good one at any time, but the injury done to the older ones is not so great as that forced upon the more callow youngsters. A good tight shed well cleaned and bedded often, a good sized yard in which to run at will and plenty of good feed are cardinal requisites in the successful rearing of market horses.

Testimony For Tobacco Feeding.
A year ago I asked a farmer in northern Ohio to try tobacco for his sheep and lambs, pure breeds and grades, and report to me, writes Joseph E. Wing in the Breeder's Gazette. "Here is his report. Is it not probable that thoroughness is the essential of success with tobacco feeding?"
"According to promise, I will report to you that I kept tobacco in the salt box at all times and did not lose a single lamb of the 104 from sixty-nine ewes. I sold eighty-five of them that averaged ninety-eight pounds at 5 cents."

Selecting the Boar.
In selecting a boar get a good, strong hog of good proportions, best of bone, vigorous, well hammed, of masculine appearance, good head and ear and a round rib, and in this way you raise the quality of easy feeders that is worth much to the man who is making pork hogs.

Needed by All Dairywomen.
Scales, thermometer, paper and pencil are things very necessary for all dairywomen. They are of everyday value, and a record helps much in the sale of a cow.
