FUEL FROM MUD THE LATEST THING

Simple Little Plan to Circumvent the Coal Man.

From the Kansas City Star:

Fuel from mud!
When the titanic coal man bows his head in deference to a science that takes a handful of mud and, compressing the water out of its murky sub-stance, transforms it into a competing fuel, surely then must we be near to the plane wherein the gods abide, al-though, on second thought, it may seem very like a retrogression to the primitiveness of our prehistoric fore-fathers.

Thus, when fire was first subdued dried grasses were used to feed the flamcs. This was followed by turf, then wood and finally by coal, the production and transportation of which have been brought in recent years to high degree of perfection; so high, in fact, that it is prematurely going the way of the shipbuilding combine. But this is due to the limited number of fields and added to this, the difficulty of mining, the distance of transportation to tide-water and the greed of monopolists water and the greed of monopolists have placed prohibitive prices on this essential commodity.

The changes in the use of fuels from the time fire was first kindled until the production of anthracite were the result of long years and hard work on the part of countless men, but the change from good coal to mud is made at a single hound and is the outcome at a single bound and is the outcome of the tremendous efforts of practically three men, principally two men and specifically one man. These are Prof. specifically one man. These are Prof. Charles L. Norton of Harvard university. Edward Atkinson of Boston and H. H. Wotherspoon, jr., of New York

In the conversion of mud into coal the process is practically instantaneous, when the time of its production is com-pared with that employed in its geologic formation, but to be placed cate-gorically in the same class as coal the mud fuel must partake of the qualities of the former both in its chemical equivalents and its calorific values; that is, it must cantain practically the same proportions of carbon and the gases as the coal formed in nature and emit an equal amount of heat.

Now a word as to mud. In the popular mind mud is a thing apart from a combustible material, and this induction is true, but just as there are men and men, even so there is mud and mud. Mud may be divided into two classes— the mud of the first class is the result of disintegration of inorganic matter with a large percentage of water, as the technician would say, while mud of the second class is the result of a whole or partial decomposition of organic or partial decomposition of organic matter with a large percentage of water—which means, of course, that the first kind of mud is formed of sand or earth and that the second kind is composed of vegetable matter.

There is a vast difference between the two kinds, but in no way is this more strikingly brought out than in the fact that the first kind of mud won't sor castle during the visit raid leafur.

fact that the first kind of mud won't burn, whereas mud of the second class will burn if is is properly treated. It ll burn if is is properly treated. It therefore, the kind of mud that demonstrated her appreciation of the burns that concerns the bog fuel en- gems. At the royal wedding last week burns that concerns the bog fuel engineer.

Inorganic or dead mud is merely due to a mechanical mixture of dry earth and waters but organic or live mud is caused by deposits of partly or fully decomposed vegetable matter, caused by a chemical combination of the water.

Vegetable matter, such as grasses, plants, shrubs and mosses, decompose rapidly in the open air, under ordinary circumstances, and give off their nitrogen and a little hyrdogen and oxygen gems. At the royal wedding last week she wore a dazzlingly beautiful set of amethysts and dazzlingly beautiful set of amethysts and dazzlingly beautiful set of amethysts and damonds, and to her god-daughter. Miss Alexandra Fellowes, upon her marriage to Captain Stanley, her majesty's present was a pendant of diamonds and amethysts.

The queen has bought many amethysts in Edinburgh and at Balmoral, thus perpetuating the custom made by Queen Victoria, who was a ready purchaser of all Scottish gems, and particularly of Scottish pearls. Amethysts are found in the higher Gram-very rapidly, but when the vegetable growths are submerged in swamps, ponds and other still bodies of water gases are given off in the form of marsh gas, and the carbon, the invaluable element required for combustion,

Carbon is found in all living things, in wood, flesh and other products of vegetable and animal life, and when these substances are heated to a sufficiently high temperature they black-en, and afterward, if they are heated in the air, they burn up. This blackening, as the primers on chemistry tell us, is due to the fact that the substances all contain carbon. When they are heated the other elements are driven off first in various forms, while the carbon is the last to go. If they are heated in the air, the carbon finally combines with the oxygen and forms a colorless ras—it burns up.

The places where mud bearing fuel may be found are depressions of land where the drainage has been poor, and epresents decomposed vegetable matter, probably having a large percentage of carbon. Sometimes these bodies contain larger amounts of inorganic matter, such as sand, etc., which impairs their value to fuel. The underlying bed of decomposed vegetation represents a coal vein in the early stages of its formation, called young coal. This mud contains a large amount of vegetable fibre in its makeup, and these tubes of plant life hold a great deal of noisture.

Now the operation of making coal from mud in accordance with the plans first advocated in this country by Edward Atkinson and H. H. Wotherspoon Jr., is exceedingly simple, and through the courtesy of these gentlemen the writer was granted the opportunity to turn out fuel from mud with the simple apparatus to his own satisfaction. To describe the entire process it need only be said that the mud from the bog is taken and thrown upon a dump, where it is placed in a macerating machine the function of which is to tear or break up the bog mud. Then it goes through a cutting process for the purpose of destroying the fibrous structure and at the same time liberates the binding material or pentazane, which sticks the particles of mud together. The third process is to mix and knead the mass when it is concentrated by forcing some of the water out, and as a result it is converted into a dense, black, rubber-like structure in about an hour's time. The last operation is to place this mixture in the apparatus designed to force the adhesive mud trough a tube made of metal. As the mold form emerges from the tube it is cut off in whatever length is desirable, and the coal briguettes are placed in the coal briquettes are placed in the sun and air to dry. Part of the original water contents are lost in the operation, and the evaporation of the bal-ance is completed in summer in from fifteen to twenty days, when the bricks have become as hard, brittle and com-pact as a lump of bituminous coal, thanks to the adhesiveness of the binding element—pentazane.

This process requires but simple ma-This process requires but simple machinery if small quantities are to be worked up, but with plants operating in a commercial way the machinery must be powerful and efficient.

In Ireland the word "peat" is applied to the substance of peat bogs, like our own, and the word "turf" is used to designate the mud obtained from rasses. Turf has been converted into fuel by Irish peasants for years, while
