Girls Might Have Fooled Their Fathers

By RUTH MILLETT

Headlines over the divorce story said: "He Wanted Boys, Girls Were Born; Sues For Divorce."

Some day he may discover he made a big mistake. If he wanted boys for companionship he might have gone ahead to train his girls to be ideal companions. They could have been brought up to enjoy such pursuits as hunting and fishing. They never would have entered into real competition with their old man.

Furthermore, daughters never make a man feel old. Sons do, yes. They even seem to take a delight in pushing pop into retirement. But daughters, with their calculated compliments and admiration, make a man feel young.

If he wanted sons to carry on in his business or profession the man who was disappointed in having daughters could have turned the disappointment into satisfaction by encouraging his daughters to become career women. He would have stood just as good a chance of getting a daughter to follow in his footsteps as a son. Look at all the disappointed dads, whose sons have decided against being a lawyer or a doctor like dad.

And it's daughters—not sons—who can be counted on to stay close to their family through the years. There's real truth in that old saying about a daughter being a daughter all of her life.

It's an old-fashioned man who thinks he has been cheated when the stork keeps leaving daughters instead of sons. Daughters no longer belong exclusively to their mothers and to feminine society. Given half a chance a girl today can become just as good a friend of her father's as his son—perhaps even a better friend. For a man accepts a daughter's shortcomings with better grace than he accepts a son's. And a daughter is more likely to humor a father in his wishes than is a boy, eager to prove his own superiority.

It's too bad that father wasn't willing to give his daughters a chance to take the place of sons. Copyright, 1944, NEA Service, Inc.
