The open air on a quiet day, when the atmosphere is not disturbed by convection-currents, is probably the best possible place for speaking to a large number of people. Wesley is said to have preached successfully to twenty thousand martin, Mrs Artic McQueen, Mrs P on a calm day. The open air on a quiet ple gathered together in a natural amphitheater formed by the hills, and on a us take a small platform arranged for an open-air speaker, and notice how an audiopen-air speaker, and notice how an audilight about it. If the audience is large and each person anxious to near, we shall find that the outline of the crowd will be that of a section cut through an egg, with the speaker placed at the focus of the smaller end. As in an auditorium we trust to the natural diffusion of sound to absorb the stray rays, we should evidently adopt this same ovate section for the outline of the floor. But, when we come to consider further that it is desirable to place each member of the audience. le to place each member of the audience that he can see the speaker, and so that the speaker's voice may come directly to n, we see that we conform still further to the egg-shape, for, in order that we may do this, the floor must curve upward as it recedes from the speaker, and the galleries form only a continuation of this curve. To that we may say that the proper shape of an auditorium is in general that of an egg-shell, the speaker being at the focus of the maller end, and the audience being seated over the lower half, while the upper half forms the vaulted roof. Like an egg-shell, we have seen that the walls should be thin
