CAPT. KIDD'S CAVE

"Queer tales of Mr. Hudson, eh?" "Yes," answered my friend, as his steam yacht shot along the glassy river, dodging in and out among canal boat villages, schooners, ice barges, lordly steamers and a world of small sail. "Tell me, have you never encountered a real, nerve creeping legend along here among these Highland shadows--some companion tale to the wraith out of which Rip Van Winkle grew? You spend months darning up and down, in and out here amid the bows and frowns of Crow's Nest, Dunderberg and Storm King."

alpine avian. One listened to near them crash upon the floor of some chamber deeper down. Then again the strangely beautiful darting of our lantern's rays, as you have seen the secondary beams dash down and branch in trembling movement into the heart of a torrid pond. We walked erect. We were frequently in chambers of considerable size, as was easy to perceive by the touch of the hand on the rocky corridor, then nothing to touch, then a narrow passage-way once more. In not one of these gigantic chambers did the darkness yield to our light sufficient to show dimensions. It was indeed darkness eternal. Since the sun was created there was space where he had never shone. Yet the air was cool, and grew sweeter, even exhilarating, as we proceeded. Proceeded! A thousand times had I resolved to return, but old Pete seemed deaf. No word of entreaty penetrated his ears. Even the clink of silver dollars would not rouse him to any response. He plodded on. We thought of the aged guide's feeble hand beat with its 91 years of age. What if he should stop and join the ghastly shades that mayhap haunted the place? We were about agreed on forcibly halting him when, in an eye's twinkling, the decayed old man began to dash. As he sprang up and down and waved his hands, the castles of rich men peered at us from the verdant clad banks, and here and there from a velvet park the Yankee liberty bell held aloft the red, white and blue, fluttering in the sultry midsummer sheen. "See yonder!" We both spoke it. "The wonderful glory shone from a person. 'The woman in the case!' exclaimed my friend. 'Capt. Kidd's bride,' I replied, and we both laughed, though why we laughed I do not know; surely I was never more deeply terrorized in my life. Probably it was not a very joyous laugh. As for our youthful-aged guide, he was now fairly on his knees before the apparition. It was the figure of a pleasing woman, English, I should say, though my friend says Dutch to this day. I think she spoke English; my friend says Dutch. I think she was dressed in the old English garb of two centuries ago. My friend, better versed in these things than I, says she wore the picturesque costume of the Netherlands. But then her robe was so shining white that no eye could linger on it long. Behind the lady stood the precious pots of treasure trove. Spoils from the Spanish main and yet from the Tomara seas! Blood money! A pirate's wealth! To every glittering piece a dying sailor's hands had clung. The groans of dead loads of wounded men seemed still to lurk amid the mossy piles. The rude kettles ran over with the stuff. Handfuls lay on the floor about the prong like legs of old iron chairs. 'I said she spoke. If I understood her aright this is what she said: 'Return! This wealth is in trust. Know ye the Van Houghtapotings, of great New York?' My friend managed to groan out that he was acquainted with this very old family in the persons of some of its latest representatives. 'This wealth is their supply. Once each year, at Christmas, I take them a pot of this silver and gold. That's how they live, for they toil not, neither do they spin.' I awake. We were lying quietly mid-stream of New York harbor, and softly cradled in a midsummer's twilight. 'That fish dinner!' I exclaimed to my friend. 'It was me dream.' 'Exactly my case,' he replied. On comparing our dreams they were singularly alike, in fact quite identical. A dream, I confess, nevertheless, that some such legend floating amid the purple shadows of the Highlands on the Hudson. --Emily J. Hayes in Boston Globe.

Waver Too Late. Of some one whose name has been famous in the annals of history it was never recorded that "his great work was not begun until the clock of his age had struck fifty-eight." Of Ludovico it has been written that not until he had reached the ripe age of 115 years could he settle his mind to prepare for the world of letters the memoirs of his own times. This marvelous triumph of mental powers was alluded to by Voltaire, who was personally a remarkable instance of the enthusiasm of age--Harper's Bazar.
