How a Brave Confederate Spy Outwitted One of the Gentler Sex.

When Schofield had retreated on Nashvill after the battle of Franklin, Hood followed him up and invested the city. He wasn't strong enough to capture the place, and Schofield wasn't strong enough to come out, and so matters stood until Grant could send up Thomas with reinforcements and take the aggressive.

It was during this period of inactivity that I was sent into Nashville to observe what the Union forces were doing and pick up such points as might be of value to Gen. Hood. While scouting is dangerous looked a little as if the court was upon the sent the second was not because the fair damse wasn't nuff, the scout who turns spy doubles his Tisk and dangers at once.

It was left to me to decide what character I should take, and twenty-four hours after my talk with the General I was in Nashville. I had turned farmer, and I went in with a horse and buggy. I had corn to sell the quartermaster, and the rea-son I wasn't in the Confederate army was because of my being stiff in the left leg and so nigh-sighted that my eyes were good for nothin' at all arter dark. I had to do a little practicing to keep my knee stiff and git a natural limp to my gait, and the nigh-sighted pizness had to be worked up and kept in mind. It was well for me that I had a plausible story ready cooked, for I was at once taken before the Provost Marshal and questioned in the sharpest manner. I lived eighteen miles away; I had 400 bushels of corn to sell; I hadn't fit on either side; I voted agin secession. This was my story, and arter brow-beating me fur a spell I was turned loose to find the quartermaster and make a bargain

The city was bilin' full of refugees, and had in hand-to hush the matter up. there was a heap of confusion and excitepin' place when I lit upon a quiet street and had the luck to hit a house kept by a widow. There were only five or six boarders, and none of these belonged to the army. There were two women, two Yankee cotton buyers, a store clerk or two and myself. Says the widow to me as I paid her three days' board in ad-"If any one should ask your business 'And are your eyes weak?" "Powerful marm. I manage to poke around fairly well by daylight, but arter sundown I'm no good. I kin see to get around, but that's all. Weakness of the eye is a great affliction, marm."

It was in the torenoon I engaged board with the widow, and I was promptly on hand at dinner and supper. The other boarders scarcely gave me a second look, and each one was apparently satisfied with the first, but I must say that dinner was not yet over when it struck me that wanted to know all about my farm and family and nayburs, and somehow it flidn't seem as if my answers exactly suited her. Howsumever, I dismissed her she had questioned me

I spent the day wandering about and taking notes and posting myself as far as possible on the strength of the army and the sort of defenses being thrown up. I did not go out after supper, which meal was served by lamplight, and at an early hour went off to bed. The room given me had been a sort of upstairs store while things were tolerably clean there Howsumever it was war times, and thou-could not be found in case of my arrest. Naturally supposing myself sate from all eyes, I let up on the limp which I had carefully stuck to all day, and by the light of a very poor lamp set about my writing.

When this was finished I rolled the paper Into a small wad and placed it in one of the buttons of my coat, which was hollowed out for the purpose. This operation had just been concluded when the door of any room—it had no lock—was opened and the widow walked in. The place was surrounded and with the utmost precaution, led on by Uncle Nick, the men gradually closed in, but no snake, but there were unmistakable signs of its having been there a short time before, and after searching for a short time a trail, which looked as if a log had been drawn on the ground, was found leading towards the Ohio river. Several men fol-lowed the trail till dark set in and then returned to town. It is thought by a great many to be the same snake so often seen by residents of Moscow, O., as the trail led in that direction. The excitement has not yet subsided, and black
